VOLUME LVI

Kept to Date by Cumulative Annual Pocket Parts

EXPLANATION

THE object in view in preparing Corpus Juris Secundum has been twofold: First, to provide a complete encyclopedic treatment of the whole body of the law, which means that it must be based upon all the reported cases; Second, to present each title of the law in form and content most suitable as a means of practical reference for the Bench and Bar.

Corpus Juris Secundum is therefore a complete restatement of the entire body of American Law. The clear-cut and exhaustive propositions comprising the text are supported by all the authorities from the earliest times to date. The supporting case citations, conspicuously set out in the notes, point to all decisions handed down since the publication of Corpus Juris. When the searcher may wish to consult earlier authorities, a specific reference to Corpus Juris makes available all cases back to 1658.

Each title is preceded by a complete section analysis, greatly simplified to facilitate research. Where the scope of any section is such as to require it, a more minute analysis is found thereunder in its appropriate place within the title (see Abatement and Revival, Section 112). The convenience of this method—an innovation in encyclopedic writing—must immediately commend itself.

A concise black-letter summary, indicative of its scope, precedes the full treatment or statement of the law under each section. These introductory summaries, concise and free from interlineation of authorities, have proven of great convenience and value in legal research.

An index is found in the back of each volume covering the titles contained therein, thus providing another convenient means of ready access to the text and notes.

Corpus Juris Secundum is kept to date by means of annual cumulative pocket parts for each volume. This feature of supplementation which has proved so successful in modern digests and statutes conveniently, and with certainty, keeps each title constantly to date through current cases and new precedents.

Corpus Juris Secundum represents the combined product of the highest editorial talent and manufacturing skill. Its many excellent editorial features are fittingly accompanied by corresponding innovations and improvements in mechanical arrangement, typography, and design, which the publisher believes will commend themselves to the profession as representing a new standard in legal publications.

I. THE RELATION

A. DEFINITIONS, AND CREATION AND EXISTENCE OF RELATION

§ 1. Definitions

a. Relation defined generally
b. Particular terms defined
c. Terms compared and distinguished

a. Relation Defined Generally

The relation of master and servant is that which arises out of an express or implied contract of employment between a master or employer on the one hand and a servant or employee on the other.

While the relationship of master and servant is not capable of exact definition and cannot be defined in general terms with substantial accuracy,[1] it may nevertheless be stated broadly that the relation is that which arises out of a contract of employment, express or implied, between a master or employer on the one hand and a servant or employee on the other.[2] The relationship of employer and employee is substantially the same as that of master and servant,[3] but it has been said that the terms "employer" and "employee" make a better designation of the relation in this industrial age,[4] particularly in view of the fact that Americans as a rule do not like the word "servant."[5]

Distinctions between the relationships of agency and master and servant are discussed in Agency § 2 e; those between employer and employee and joint adventurers in Joint Adventures § 1 b (3); and those between landlord and tenant and master and servant in Landlord and Tenant § 6.

b. Particular Terms Defined

Generally speaking a "servant" or "employee" is a person who renders service to another, usually for wages, salary, or other financial consideration, and who in the performance of such service is entirely subject to the direction and control of the other, such other being respectively the "master" or "employer."

He is deemed to be a master who has the superior choice, control, and direction of the servant, and whose will the servant represents not merely in the ultimate result of the work, but in the details.[6] Stated otherwise, a "master" is a principal who employs another to perform service in his affairs and who controls, or has the right to control, such ployment;[39] anyone who renders labor or services to another.[40] The term is applicable only to one in the present service of another, and does not embrace one who has at some time been, but no longer is, in the employment of another.[41]

Although the term is often used in referring to deputies and assistants of public officers,[42] in common speech the term is usually applied to clerks, laborers, and persons rendering service in similar capacities;[43] it rarely refers to the higher officers of a corporation or government or to domestic servants,[44] and an "employee" is generally distinguished from an official or officer, or one employed in a position of some authority.[45] Of course, like the term "servant," the term "employee" may have different meanings in different connections.[46]

"Employ," "employed," and "employment." The term "to employ" is not restricted to entering into a master and servant relationship.[47] Similarly, while the word "employed" may be used to describe a master and servant relation,[48] it does not necessarily import every sort of such relation.[49] "Employment" has been defined, on the one hand, as the act of attending to the duties and services of another,[50] and, on the other hand, as the act of hiring.[51]

Other terms. The term "lumping" in the vernacular of members of a trade union is used to designate a method of doing work where the contractor is only the figurehead of the owner who purchases the material and assumes all the responsibility in connection with the contract.[52]

"Straw boss" is a term sometimes applied to a boss without any authority,[53] or one who, in the absence of the real boss, is clothed with authority.[54] A straw boss is a second foreman;[55] a sort of subforeman[56] or superior servant.[57]

§ 2. Essentials of Relation

a. In General

Although various elements may tend to indicate the existence of a master and servant relation, no one fact or circumstance is necessarily conclusive; ordinarily the question is one of fact to be determined from all the circumstances of the case.

Although the authorities have frequently enumerated various elements the presence of which tend to indicate that a given relationship is that of master and servant,[68] it has been pointed out that

Designation by parties

The existence of the relation of master and servant does not depend on how the parties designate each other; nor is it affected by provisions or stipulations in the contract that their relationship should not be considered that of master and servant.

Skill

(1) Even where skill is required, if occupation is one which ordinarily is considered as a function of the regular members of the household or an incident of business establishment of employer there is an inference that actor is a servant.—First Nat. Bank of Oxford v. Mississippi Unemployment Compensation Commission, 23 So.2d 534, 199 Miss. 97.

no one fact or circumstance is necessarily conclusive.[69] Hence, whether an individual is a servant or employee or occupies some other relationship ordinarily is a question of fact,[70] to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case.[71] In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, working members of a partnership will not be considered employees.[72] In determining whether the relation between parties is that of master and servant rather than some other legal relationship,

(2) Fact that particular occupation involves technical skill putting control of details beyond capacity of employer does not preclude member of skilled profession from becoming an employee, since the right to control may exist although the ability to do so does not.—Tetting v. Hotel Pfister, 266 N.W. 249, 221 Wis. 141.

Effect on business practices

In determining whether overriding royalty owners were employers of laborer suing to recover unpaid wages and liquidated damages, although fundamental legal rights may not be sacrificed, where the question is two-sided and sensitively balanced one way or the other, the courts may consider how decision may help or hinder accepted business practices.—Divine v. Sharing profits and losses

(1) Contract by which operator of finance company engaged another to manage the business and share the profits and losses was not a contract of employment but created a partnership.—Duvic v. Home Finance Service, La.App., 23 So.2d 790.

(2) Where contractors agreed to pay superintendent a specified sum per month and one-half of profits from construction contracts, which contractors were bound to perform but to which the superintendent was not a party, the superintendent was an employee and not a partner.—Brown v. Neyland, Tex.Civ.App., 161 S.W.2d 833, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds Neyland v. Brown, 170 S.W.2d 207, 141 Tex. 53, modified on other grounds on rehearing 172 S.W.2d 89, 141 Tex. 253.

it is necessary to consider the usual attributes of each.[73] The relationship between parties may be that of employer and employee for one purpose, and some other relationship for other purposes.[74]

b. Contractual Basis of Relation

The relation of master and servant arises out of contract, the assent of both parties being essential.

The relation of master and servant arises out of contract,[75] the assent of both parties being essential, as discussed infra § 5. The relation does not arise between employees and one who has made advances to, or guaranteed the accounts of, the business in which they are employed,[76] or even one who has agreed with the owner to pay the salaries of employees.[77] Nevertheless, it has been held that as to third persons it is not requisite that any actual contract should subsist between two parties to constitute them master and servant, it being sufficient that the work is done by one for the other with the latter's knowledge and assent;[78] and it has also been held that employees working on a day-to-day basis without any contract for any specified period of employment occupy a status rather than a contractual relationship.[79] As to one not a party thereto, a written contract is not conclusive in determining whether the relationship between the parties is that of master and servant.[80]

Effect of servant's agreement with third person. The fact that a servant performing services for his master has entered into an agreement with a third person by which it is provided that he is to be deemed, while so engaged, the servant of the latter, cannot alter the real relation between him and his employer.[81]

c. Right to Enter into Relationship

Any person not under a legal disability is capable of becoming either a master or servant; a person may dispose of his own labor as he wishes provided he does not violate a contract or statute, and an employer has the right freely to contract and to select his employees in the absence of statutory inhibitions.

As a general rule every person of the full age of twenty-one years, and not under any legal disability, is capable of becoming either a master or a servant.[82] However, in order that a contract of hiring and service may be legally binding, it is necessary that, at the time such a contract is entered into, the party about to be hired should be free from any other engagement incompatible with that into which he is about to enter; in other words, he must be sui juris.[83] Every person has a legal right to dispose of his own labor as he wishes and to work for whom he pleases;[84] he is at liberty to withhold or give his labor on such terms as he deems proper[85] as long as he does not violate an express contract[86] or statute.[87] In the absence of statutory inhibitions the employer also has the right freely to contract, the right to select his employees, and to conduct his business in any manner satisfactory to himself;[88] and this right has frequently been mentioned as one of the tests to determine whether a master and servant relation exists.[89] Since, as discussed supra subdivision b of this section, the relation of master and servant is purely contractual, it follows that if either party is incapable of contracting there is no mutuality and neither is bound.[90]

(1) In General

The essential characteristic of the master and servant relation is the retention by the employer of the right to direct and control the manner in which the work shall be performed, the right to determine not merely the result but the methods and means by which such result is to be accomplished.

The relation of master and servant exists when, and only when, the employer retains the right to direct the manner in which the business shall be done, as well as the result to be accomplished, or, in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done;[91] and the existence of such right cause;[96] but, while the right to discharge has been said to constitute an unfailing test,[97] it has generally been held not to be conclusive of the question.[98]

In order to constitute a weighty, if not conclusive, factor in determining whether the relationship between parties is that of master and servant, the control of the alleged master must be complete or unqualified;[99] it must be authoritative control[1] reaching into the details of how the work is performed,[2] and must be distinguished from mere suggestion as to detail or necessary coöperation where

Limited or unlimited right

In determining whether relation of master and servant exists, unlimited right of discharge indicates completeness of control; but, where right may be exercised only if employee's work is unsatisfactory, importance of right as factor pointing to authoritative control is diminished.—Winther v. Limited control

There may be a general control arising from an interest in the final result of employment which does not indicate a master and servant relationship, where such right of control relates only to result and is so restricted or limited that it does not apply to manner or means by which work is accomplished.—Coleng v. Ramsdell, 65 P.2d 365, 19 Cal.App.2d 376.

2. Cal.—Winther v. Industrial Accident Commission of California, 60 P.2d 342, 345, 16 Cal.App.2d 131.

"Whether the control which an employer has the right to exercise over the manner in which the work is to be performed is best expressed through its modification by the word 'authoritative,' or by the word 'unqualified,' or by the word 'complete,' it is clear from the decisions that it must be a control that reaches into the details of performance and reserves to the employer the right to direct the manner in which these details are to be carried out."—Winther v. Industrial Accident Commission of California, supra.

the work furnished is part of a larger undertaking.[3] In other words, a person beneficially interested in work being performed by another may exercise a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose without incurring the responsibilities or acquiring the immunities of a master with respect to the person so controlled;[4] and the existence of a master and servant relationship will not be inferred from the mere reservation of powers which do not deprive the person doing the work of his right to do the work according to his own initiative as long as he does it in accordance with the contract.[5]

A mere authority to direct the course of a third person's servant is not inconsistent with his remaining the servant of such third person,[6] and the mere reservation of the right to discharge[7] or inspect the work of[8] employees of another will not create the relation where it does not otherwise exist.

(2) Several Masters or Employers

Under some circumstances a person may be the servant of two masters at the same time; and the general servant of one master may, with his consent, be lent to another person and become his servant with respect to a particular transaction or piece of work.

Ordinarily a person cannot be the servant of two masters at the same time.[9] There are, however, exceptions to this rule;[10] and under some circumstances a person may have two different employers concerning whom his rights may differ.[11] Thus a person may be the servant of two masters at one time and as to one act, even though they are not joint employers, provided the service to one does not involve abandonment of the service to the other.[12]

Performing to "satisfaction"
A person employed to perform certain work is not necessarily a mere "servant" because employment contract provides that work shall be subject to employer's approval or satisfaction, for such provision is not assumption by employer of right to control employee as to details or methods of doing work, but only enables employer to see that contract is carried out according to plans.

Servant lent or hired to another. The general servant of one person may be lent to, and become the servant of, another by submitting himself to the direction and control of the other with respect to a particular transaction or piece of work,[13] even though the general employer has an interest in the special work,[14] and in such case the servant remains the general servant of the lender except as to the particular work done for the borrower.[15] However, such a relation between the borrower and the servant is not established unless it appears that the servant has expressly, or by implication, consented to the transfer of his services to the new master,[16] and unless the lender surrenders and the borrower assumes the power of supervision and control.[17]

Where a master gives the labor of his servant to another, the master retaining supervision and control, the lent servant is not the servant of the borrower,[18] but is, while so engaged, the servant of the general master.[19] The determination of whose servant an employee is in a given case depends on who has the right to control him with respect to the work in question[20] and on whether or not such work is within the scope and course of the employment.[21] The servant of a buyer assisting the servant of a seller in setting up machinery on the buyer's premises and under his direction and control is the servant of such buyer while he is so employed, and notwithstanding the contract of sale provides the installation shall be done by the seller.[22]

ing it are factors to be considered in determining whether a master and servant relationship exists, but such considerations are not conclusive.

Although it is unquestionably one of the indicia of a contract of employment creating a master and servant relation,[23] the receipt of a stated wage is not essential to create,[24] nor does it necessarily establish the existence of,[25] such a relation; the relationship may exist although the servant neither expects nor is entitled to any compensation.[26] Thus a student is an employee while actually performing service, although without pay,[27] and although the extent and time of his services are at his own pleasure,[28] but when not engaged in such duties he ceases to be an employee,[29] and if he at no time renders service to, or for the benefit of, the alleged employer he is not an employee in the first instance.[30]

The mode of payment may be considered in determining whether the relation of master and servant exists;[31] but it is not sufficient of itself to determine the matter conclusively.[32] A master and servant relationship may exist between two persons even though the servant's compensation is paid by a third person.[33] It has been held that the fact that a servant shares in the profits instead of receiving wages does not negative the existence of a master and servant relation,[34] although it has been pointed out that the sharing of profits and losses is not generally an attribute of an ordinary employment relation.[35] The relationship may exist even though a part of the consideration for the services is to be paid in a medium other than money,[36] and it has been held that, although all the employees of employer corporation are stockholders, and are paid for their service only by the income of their stock, the relation of master and servant nevertheless exists within the meaning of a statute providing for the safety of employees.[37]

f. Services

The foundation of the master and servant relationship is service rendered by the servant to the master; some continuity of such service is essential, but it need not be uninterrupted or permanent.

The relationship of master and servant is bottomed on services rendered by the servant to the master;[38] but the mere rendition of services by one person to another does not of itself establish the master and servant relationship between them.[39] However, the fact that the agreement of an employee requires other labor than his own for its performance does not prevent him from being an employee where the contract includes his personal services to the full extent thereof.[40] It is not essential that one who has entered into a personal contract of employment with another and given the latter the right to regard him as the actual employer should intend to receive or should have received the benefit of the services of such an employee;[41] the relation of master may be assumed by one who employs another, even though he is an agent merely for the purpose of supervising the work.[42] A person may be held to be in the employ of another, even though, while performing certain services for the employer, he also performs services for himself, thus occupying a dual role.[43]

Continuity. Generally speaking, some continuity of service is essential to the existence of a master and servant relation.[44] Nevertheless it has been held that the relation does not always depend on continuity of actual everyday work,[45] and that one may be the employee of another without being engaged in performing the work of the employer at the moment.[46] The relationship of master and servant does not depend on the mere duration of employment;[47] and it may exist even though the service is not permanent.[48]

Place of work. The fact that the work involved is performed on the premises of the alleged master or employer is an indication that a master and servant relationship exists;[49] but if other tests conclusively determine the existence of a master and servant relationship the place of performance of the servant's duties is immaterial.[50]

Property and tools used. The fact that the tools and equipment of the employer are used in performing the work is an indication of a master and servant relationship;[51] but the fact that the servant makes use of his own property in performing the services does not prevent the relationship being that of master and servant,[52] and the ownership of the instrumentalities used is immaterial where the relationship is conclusively shown to exist by the application of other tests.[53]

Legality. The relation of master and servant cannot be predicated on an employment that has for its object the prosecution of a business that is unlawful or criminal.[54]

§ 3(1). Independent Contractors and Their Employees

An independent contractor is one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, without being subject to the control of his employer except as to the result of his work; an independent contractor is not a servant, and there is no master and servant relation between his servants and the employer or contractee.

Numerous definitions of the term "independent contractor" have been given by the authorities but they are not essentially different from one another.[55] Within the popular understanding which it imports, the term is wholly descriptive;[56] it serves merely to point out one of a class.[57] In certain phases of the law, however, the expression is used, not merely in a descriptive sense, but as well to designate a relationship, in the presence of which, when established, the law undertakes to prescribe distinctive rights and liabilities.[58]

In the law of master and servant, an "independent contractor" is defined as one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation and represents the will of his employer only as to the results of his work and not as to the means whereby it is accomplished;[59] one who,

a person employed to perform work on terms that he is to be free from the control of the employer as respects the manner in which the details of the work are to be executed;[63] or one who undertakes to produce a given result without being in any way controlled as to the method by which he attains that result.[64] As discussed infra § 3 (2)–3 (9) the characteristics which generally identify an independent contractor are the independent nature of his business, the existence of a contract for the performance of a specified piece of work for a fixed price, the fact that the contractor employs assistants who are under his control and furnishes the necessary materials, and the fact that he has the right to control the work while it is in progress except as to results.

A "contractor" has been defined as a person who, in the pursuit of an independent business, undertakes to do a specific piece[65] or job[66] of work for other persons,[67] using his own means and methods[68] without submitting himself to control as to the petty details.[69] A contractor is distinguished from an employee,[70] and from a workman or workingman;[71] and a distinction is likewise made between a laborer and a contractor.[72]

The relationship of master and servant does not exist between a contractee and an independent contractor[73] nor does such relationship exist between a

Law governing master-servant relationship

(1) Generally, independent contractors are not within the purview of the substantive law governing the relations of master and servant.—City of Gary v. Bontrager Const. Co., 47 N.E.2d 182, 113 Ind.App. 151.

(2) Generally, independent contractors are not within the purview of statutes, the scope of which is defined by the generic term "servants," "employees," or "agents," or by some expression which is ordinarily regarded as being applicable to a particular subdivision of the classes of persons connoted by those terms.—Bill v. Gattavara, Wash., 167 P.2d 434.

Principal contractor and independent contractor bear a relationship entirely different from that of employer and employee.—Page v. Koss Const. Co., 245 N.W. 208, 215 Iowa 1388.

contractee and a contractor generally;[74] nor, in the general acceptance of the term, is a servant a contractor,[75] so that, as discussed infra §§ 600–607, a contractee does not owe an independent contractor and its servants the duties of a master and is not liable to them as a master for their injuries in the scope of their employment, and, as discussed infra § 584, a contractee is not a master within the rule of respondeat superior as to the acts of an independent contractor and its servants and as a general rule is not liable to third persons for their torts.

The relation of master and servant does not exist between an employer or contractee and the servants of an independent contractor, or between an independent contractor and the servant of a subcontractor, and he is not responsible as master, either to or for them.[76] If, however, the employer retains or assumes control over the means and method by which the work of a contractor is to be done, the relation of master and servant exists between him and servants of such a contractor,[77] and the mere fact of nominal employment by an independent contractor will not relieve the master of liability where the servant is in fact in his employ.[78] Where an independent contractor is created or is operating as a subterfuge, an employee will be regarded as the servant of the principal employer.[79] Employees of an independent contractor must look to him, rather than to the contractee, for compensation.[80]

§ 3(2). Tests of Independent Contractor Relationship

In determining whether the relationship is that of master and servant or contractee and independent contractor, each case must be determined on its own facts and all the features of the relationship are to be considered.

As discussed supra § 3 (1) an "independent contractor" is generally defined as one who in rendering services exercises an independent employment or occupation and represents his employer only as to the results of his work and not as to the means whereby it is to be done, and the question whether one is a servant or an independent contractor has been considered in many cases,[81] and various tests have been applied in determining it.[82] It has frequently been stated that it is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule to determine whether a particular relationship is one of master and servant or contractee and independent contractor,[83] and that each case must be determined on its own

Distinguished from "workman"

"Independent contractor" is one who undertakes construction or performance of some unit or branch of larger work, hiring of labor, furnishing of materials and tools, and all that goes into term "contractor," as contrasted with that of mere "workman" or "employee."—O'Connor v. Narragansett Electric Co., 172 A. 889, 891, 54 R.I. 317.

Agent

(1) Words "independent contractor" are used in contrast with word "servant," not with "agent," since both independent contractor and servant are agents of their principal. —Texas Co. v. Mills, 156 So. 866, 171 Miss. 231.

(2) "Agent" and "independent contractor" distinguished see Agency § 2 d.

Agent

Fact that one performing services for another is latter's agent is not conclusive that he is servant or independent contractor.—Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Tone, 4 A.2d 640, 125 Conn. 183, 121 A.L.R. 998.

ship is determinative,[86] and all are to be taken into consideration in determining whether or not a person is an independent contractor.[87]

Contract. As stated infra § 580, a contractee-independent contractor relationship presupposes a contract between the parties, and, in determining whether the relationship between the parties is that of master and servant or contractee and independent contractor, resort must be made in the first instance to the contract between the parties.[88] If there is

Independence or subservience

In determining whether person performing services for another is "independent contractor" or "servant," true test is degree of independence or subserviency which contract for services would reasonably create.—Davidson v. American Drug Stores, La.App., 175 So. 157.

Payment of social security tax

Fact that employer paid social security tax on salary of one employed as general collector was a circumstance indicative of existence of master-servant relationship, because Social Security Act covers only employees, and the term "employee" does not cover an independent contractor.—Tennessee Valley Appliances v. Rowden, 146 S.W.2d 845, 24 Tenn.App. 487.

Workmen's Compensation Act cases considered

(1) Because the rule of nonliability of an independent contractor is applied to both negligence cases and compensation cases, principles of law applied in compensation cases in determining relation of parties are a guide in negligence cases.—Dean v. Ketter, 65 N.E.2d 572, 328 Ill.App. 206.

(2) The law looks to substance and not to form of the contract to determine the relationship.—Sanford v. Goodridge, 13 N.W.2d 40, 234 Iowa 1036.

(3) The parties to a contract being presumed to know legal import of contract, an express stipulation that one of the parties was a "contractor" rather than a servant would be taken in connection with entire contract, and not disregarded unless entire contract was inconsistent with stipulation.—Ex parte Board of School Com'rs of Mobile County, 178 So. 63, 235 Ala. 82.

no express contract or if the contract is ambiguous or doubtful, the conduct of the parties[89] and all of the surrounding circumstances[90] may be looked to in determining the relationship of the parties. Moreover, it has been held that in determining the relationship of the parties, their conduct and the surrounding circumstances may be examined, even though there is an express, unambiguous contract, since to hold otherwise would be to invite masters to avoid their liabilities and responsibilities by paper contracts which do not express the true relationship between the parties,[91] but it has been held that this rule applies only where the rights of third persons are involved, and that otherwise the terms of the contract, where clear, are controlling.[92] In many cases, it is broadly stated that whether the relationship is that of master and servant or contractee and independent contractor is to be determined from the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, and all of the surrounding circumstances.[93]

Void contract. The fact that a contract establishing a contractee-independent contractor relationship is void for noncompliance with statutory requirements does not change the contractor's relationship from that of an independent contractor to a servant so as to render the owner liable for his negligence.[94]

Independent business. The mere fact that the employee is one who carries on a separate and independent employment does not necessarily make him an independent contractor,[95] although it is a circumstance to be taken into consideration as tend-

(4) Employee held independent contractor notwithstanding words in the contract providing that the company agreed to prosecute the work as an "independent contractor" were stricken from a clause therein.—Wawrzonek v. Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corporation, 12 N.E.2d 525, 276 N.Y. 412.

Social security number

Notation of social security number above caption of written contract fixing codefendant's relationship to company as that of an independent contractor could not of itself determine relationship.—Columbus & G. Ry. Co. v. Robinson, 198 So. 749, 189 Miss. 675.

Interstate Commerce Act provision that services of person engaged within terminal areas transferring interstate shipments from one motor carrier to another are excluded from direct regulation by Interstate Commerce Commission but that services performed by transferrer should be considered to be performed by the carrier, does not alter the legal relation between the parties as fixed by their contract and does not transform the relation of an independent contractor into that of employer and employee.—Albers v. Great Central Transport Corp., 59 N.E.2d 389, 740 Ohio App. 425, affirmed 60 N.E.2d 669, 145 Ohio St. 129.

Fact that employment is for one job only and requires no supervision is not conclusive that workman is an independent contractor.—Kehr-

ing to show that he is an independent contractor,[96] and the fact that he is not engaged in an independent business does not prevent his being an independent contractor.[97] It has been held that the question whether the employee is engaged in an independent business does not depend on whether he is serving one person or many persons.[98]

Assignment of performance. The right to substitute or assign to another the performance of the contract indicates that the contract created a contractee-independent contractor relationship and not a master-servant relationship,[99] and the presence or absence of such right is a factor to be considered in determining the relationship of the parties.[1]

Control of premises. A significant factor in determining whether a master-servant or a contractee-independent contractor relationship exists is the place where the work is to be done.[2] The fact that the work is performed on the employer's premises is indicative of a master-servant relationship,[3] whereas, if the work is performed on premises under the employee's control, it indicates a contractee-independent contractor relationship.[4] However, the fact that the owner of the premises on which work is to be done by an employee retains control thereof does not prevent the employee from being an independent contractor.[5]

The period of employment is a circumstance that may be considered in determining whether the employee is an independent contractor.[6]

§ 3(3). —— Control

The right to control the mode of doing the work is the principal consideration in determining whether one employed is a servant or an independent contractor.

A servant is one who works under his master's direction and control, whereas an independent contractor is engaged to do certain work, but to exercise his own discretion as to the mode and manner of doing it.[7] If the one hired to do the work represents or is subject to the control of the employer as to the means, or as to the mode, manner, and details of the performance of the work, he is a servant and not an independent contractor;[8] but, if he

Special skill or calling

Fact that person has distinct occupation or calling or that he is given employment by reason of special skill does not fix his status as independent contractor rather than employee or servant in that particular employment, but, even though employee has peculiar skill and was employed because of such skill, he is "employee" or "servant" if employer retains right to control.—Ochoa v. General employment

Where one is employed generally to perform certain services, and there is no specific contract to do certain piece of work according to specifications for stipulated sum, it is inferable that employer has retained right to control manner, method, and means of performance of contract, and that employee is not an "independent contractor."—Continental Casualty Co. v. that a certain amount of freedom of action is inherent in the nature of the work does not necessarily mean that the person employed is an independent contractor rather than a servant.[10]

Principal consideration or test. Although it has been held that the fact that by the contract of employment the employer foregoes the right of control does not make one who is otherwise a mere servant an independent contractor,[11] it has, nevertheless, been very generally held that the right to control the mode of doing the work contracted for is the principal consideration in determining whether one employed is an independent contractor or a servant.[12] A similar expression of the principle is that

Where owner has no interest in performance of contract except that finished product shall be in accordance with plans and specifications, workman is "independent contractor."—Kesler Const. Co. v. Dixson Holding Corporation, 175 S.E. 843, 207 N.C. 1.

It is fundamental to the existence of "independent contractor" relationship that there be an absolute independence of action on part of contractor in execution of the work assumed by him, and, if contractee has power to interfere with or control manner of execution or performance, then contractor ceases to be independent and his status degenerates into that of an "employee" or "servant."—Coon v. Monroe Scrap Material Co., La.App., 191 So. 607—Olano v. Leathers, La.App., 2 So.2d 486.

Freedom of action

The term "independent contractor" connotes a freedom of action and choice in respect of undertaking.

When master-servant relationship exists with respect to liability of master to third persons see infra § 563.

Test for tort liability

The master's right or power to control manner in which servant shall do work is not always sole test for determining existence of relation of master and servant, but is test of master's liability for servant's negligent acts while performing his duties as servant and for determining whether party performing work is servant or independent contractor.—Knapp v. Standard Oil Co. of California, 68 P.2d 1052, 156 Or. 564.

The distinction between a servant and an independent contractor lies in the right of control over the performance of the work.

One of the most decisive elements

The existence or absence of power on part of employer to control conduct of employment is one of the most decisive elements to be considered in determining whether employee is an "independent contractor."—Standard Oil Co. v. Glenn, D. C.Ky., 52 F.Supp. 755, affirmed, C.C. A., 148 F.2d 51.

trol actually exercised may be considered in determining the right of control.[40] Where a master-servant relationship is created, the master's failure to assert or exercise his right of control does not change the relationship.[41] On the other hand, although a contract creates a contractee-independent contractor relationship, it may be transformed into a master-servant relationship by the employer's assumption of control over the details of the work,[42] and it has been held that the relationship of master and servant exists where the employer actually exercises control.[43] The employer must have control over the physical conduct of the employee in the performance of the work,[44] and in applying the test for purposes of tort liability, it should be directed to the particular factor or matter on which liability is sought to be established.[45]

§ 3(4). —— Right of Supervision

A relationship which is otherwise one of contractee-independent contractor is not destroyed by the employer's reservations of powers which do not deprive the contractor of the right to use his own judgment and discretion as to the performance of the work.

A relationship which is otherwise one of contractee-independent contractor is not destroyed by the employer's reservation of powers which do not deprive the contractor of the right to use his own judgment and discretion as to the performance of the work.[46] A contractee does not become a master where his control is limited to the result sought and to insuring compliance with the terms of the contract.[47] To take one out of the class of independent contractors and into that of servants, the employer's direction, supervision, or control must go further than to the ends sought, and must extend

Partial reservations of control of means and methods of work in certain respects only by party for whom it is done do not prevent existence of relation of contractee and independent contractor, but general control over work as to manner and method of its execution and oversight and direction of performance of actual manual labor constitute true test for determination of whether relation is that of "employer and contractor" or "master and servant." —Robert C. Buell & Co. v. Danaher, 18 A.2d 697, 127 Conn. 606.

Satisfactory results

In an independent contract, the parties may incorporate provisions tending to secure satisfactory results, and such provisions neither negative the relationship of independent contract nor point to the relationship of employer and employee.—Mountain Meadow Creameries v. Industrial Accident Commission, 76 P.2d 724, 25 Cal.App.2d 123.

Right to make suggestions

Fact that salesman fully recognized store's right to make suggestions and requests which he sought to carry out were circumstances to be considered in determining whether relation between parties was that of independent contractor or of employer and employee.—Moore-Handley Hardware Co. v. Williams, 189 So. 757, 238 Ala. 189.

Complete disassociation from work

Owner or employer, in order to avoid responsibility of master, need not entirely absent himself from work, or entirely disassociate himself from active interest, or aid in performance, or from supervision of results as long as details of work, physical management of instrumentalities used, and physical conduct of those employed remain under sole control of contractor or of those placed in authority by him.—Cook v. Wright, 171 So. 686, 177 Miss. 644.

General control exercised over independent contractor to facilitate service and accomplish proper result is insufficient to make contractor a servant.—Dave Lehr, Inc., v. Brown, 91 S.W.2d 693, 127 Tex. 236.

to the details of the work.[48] The fact that the right of supervision or inspection is reserved to the employer or his representative for the purpose of seeing that the specific work is done in compliance with the contract will not prevent the employee from being an independent contractor;[49] in other words, the retention of the right to supervise as to results, as distinguished from the right to supervise as to the means by which the intermediate results should be obtained, does not affect the relationship.[50]

If the relation of employer and independent contractor is otherwise made out from the terms of the contract, such relation is not affected by a reservation of the right to the employer to change the general plan of the work,[51] or of the right to make any deviation from, or alteration of, the contract.[52] The relation is not affected by a reservation of the right to fix the time for doing the work,[53] the right to direct as to the quantity of work to be done,[54] the right to approve contracts with subcontractors,[55] or the right to require the putting on of an extra force to complete the work if in the judgment of the employer's engineer this is necessary to complete the work within the time fixed by the contract.[56] Nevertheless, the right of supervision means merely the right to approve or disapprove the results of the work and does not give the owner the right to make directions as to the mode of arriving at such results.[57]

§ 3(5). —— Power to Terminate Relationship

The power to terminate the relationship at will is an important, but not decisive, factor in determining whether the relationship is that of master-servant or of contractee-independent contractor.

Minutiae of conduct
Control must extend much further into the minutiae of alleged servant's conduct than merely telling him where to go.—Patterson v. Barnes, 60 N.E.2d 82, 317 Mass. 721.

Although the control goes to the extent of conditioning the work in many aspects, still, if the contractor is left free to exercise his own will generally respecting methods and means, he is an independent contractor.—Kansas City, M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Loosley, 90 P. 990, 76 Kan. 103.

party to terminate the relationship at will is an important factor to be considered in determining whether the relationship is one of master and servant or one of contractee and independent contractor.[58] Where the parties have the right to terminate the relationship at will, it indicates a master-servant relationship,[59] whereas a contractee-independent contractor relationship is indicated where the parties do not have such right.[60] However, it is not of itself a decisive and conclusive factor,[61] and, where a relationship of contractee-independent contractor is otherwise clearly established, the fact that there is the power to terminate the relationship at will does not change it to a master-servant relationship.[62]

§ 3(6). —— Control of Contractor's Servants

Control over the employee's servants is a test of whether the employee is a servant or an independent contractor.

Another test of whether an employee is a servant or an independent contractor is whether he has the power to control and direct servants in the performance of their work,[63] but this test is not conclusive.[64] The power of the employee to employ and discharge workers in the performance of the work is not alone sufficient to create the relation of independent contractor,[65] although it is a circumstance

No significance

Fact that alleged employer could terminate employment without being liable for breach of contract had no significance on question whether other party was an employee or an independent contractor, as he would have such right in either case in absence of contract binding parties for specified period or quantity.—Employers Mut. Liability Ins. Co. v. Brower, 272 N.W. 359, 224 Wis. 485.

In a doubtful case the power to terminate the relationship may become an important circumstance.—Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 183 P. 178, 41 Cal.App. 468.

Insurance agent

Fact that insurance company reserved right to discharge district agent at will was a most important circumstance as indicating that relationship between company and district agent was relationship of employer and employee rather than employer and independent contractor.—Knight v. Milk route

Where distributor was placed in possession of milk route by producer, producer furnished distributor with merchandise to sell to customers, and contract provided for termination by either party on notice, right of termination was not equivalent to right of an employer to discharge an employee, or right of an employee to quit his employment, which are incident to employer-employee relationship.—Mountain Meadow Creameries v. Industrial Accident Commission, 76 P.2d 724, 25 Cal.App.2d 123.

Power to stop work

Company employed to build railroad was "independent contractor," even though contractee retained right to stop work if it was not progressing properly, such right being for contractee's protection and not for protection of others.—Slusher v. Asher, 61 S.W.2d 1057, 250 Ky. 88.

strongly indicative thereof.[66] The reservation to the employer of the right to demand the discharge of the contractor's servants under certain circumstances such as incompetence, negligence, and the like, does not affect the relationship of independent contractor where it otherwise exists,[67] although it has been said that it is a matter of considerable weight in determining the relation between employer and employee,[68] and it has been held that the reservation of the right to have discharged any servant of the contractor who disobeys the order of the owner's representative creates the relation of master and servant as between the employer and employee.[69]

The fact that in practice employees would discharge their servants, on request of the employers, for refusal to observe certain rules, and that the employers objected to the hiring of a certain class of servants, does not show such reservation of control as creates the relation of master and servant.[70] The right to annul the contract for a failure to employ a force in kind and quality to the satisfaction of the employer's representative does not show such a right of selection of the contractor's servant as to make the employer liable for injuries to him.[71]

§ 3(7). —— Materials and Appliances

Who furnishes the materials and appliances is to be taken into consideration, but is not a decisive factor in determining whether the employee is a servant or an independent contractor.

Where the employer furnishes materials and appliances for the work, it indicates a master-servant relationship,[72] whereas the furnishing of materials and appliances by the employee indicates a contractee-independent contractor relationship.[73] However, such fact, while it should be taken into consideration,[74] is not decisive as to the nature of the relationship.[75] An employee is not an independent contractor merely because he furnishes the appliances or materials.[76] On the other hand, the fact that materials are furnished by the employer does not prevent the employee being an independent contractor.[77]

§ 3(8). —— Mode of Payment

The mode of payment, while it is an element to be considered, is not decisive as to whether the employee is a servant or an independent contractor.

The mode of payment is an element to be considered in determining whether the relationship is that of master and servant or that of contractee and independent contractor[78] in a doubtful case,[79] but it is uniformly held that the mode of payment is not conclusive nor the decisive test as to the nature of the relationship,[80] and inferences derived from the mode of payment as to the nature of the relationship must yield to evidence that the person was working under general employment having no dominion or control over the premises and subject at all times to the orders of the employer as to when and how he should work and how it was to be accomplished.[81] Payment for a result or by the job is an indicia that the relationship is one of contractee and independent contractor,[82] whereas payment for the performance of work indicates a master-servant relationship.[83]

One may be an independent contractor, although not to be paid a round sum for his work,[84] as, for instance, where he is paid by the day, week, or month,[85] or by the piece,[86] or according to the time consumed,[87] or by the cubic foot as the work progresses,[88] or the cost of the work and a per cent,[89] or by some other unit of measurement,[90] or where the compensation is practically a salary;[91] and the fact that the employer furnishes the money required to pay employees of the contractor and operating expenses does not prevent the latter from being an independent contractor.[92]

On the other hand, a person is not an independent contractor merely because he is paid by the

Fixing of price and specifications. It has been held that the fact that no price was fixed, and no specifications were made, as to the work to be done does not render the contract one of mere hire and service, or create the relation of master and servant between the parties;[97] but there is authority which is apparently not in harmony with this view.[98]

§ 3(9). —— Particular Applications

The tests for determining whether an employee is a servant or an independent contractor have been applied in a great many particular situations.

Under the rules and tests discussed supra §§ 3 (2)–3 (8) for determining whether a master-servant or contractee-independent contractor relationship is established, various persons or entities have been held to be independent contractors,[99] such as an actor,[1] architect,[2] aviator,[3] collection agency,[4] cropper,[5] drover,[6] electrician,[7] engineer,[8] expressman, truckman, drayman, and the like,[9] insurance

General rule

Ordinarily draymen, truckmen, carters, etc., a part of whose regular business is the hiring of their vehicles, are regarded as independent contractors, with respect to liability of one hiring such vehicles for the negligence of owner thereof.—Joseph v. United Workers Ass'n, 23 A.2d 470, 343 Pa. 636—Tyler v. MacFadden Newspapers Corporation, 163 A. 79, 107 Pa.Super. 166.

Unloading

Trucker who agreed with gas company to unload pipe from railroad car at a specified price per car, and who for that purpose hired his own help and used his own equipment, was an independent contractor for whose negligence in unloading car gas company was not liable.—Arkansas-Louisiana Gas Co. v. Tuggle, 146 S.W.2d 154, 201 Ark. 416.

Direction to haul property to or from specific place

The direction to one engaged in general hauling to haul property to or from a specified place does not change the nature of or convert a special employment into the general relation of master and servant, with respect to liability of person for whom property is being hauled for negligence of the hauler.—Joseph v. United Workers Ass'n, 23 A. 2d 470, 343 Pa. 636.

§ 4. Substitutes

A substitute employed by a servant having the right to do so by custom or with the acquiescence of the master is entitled to the same protection and bound by the same obligations as the servant himself.

A substitute employed by a servant, in accordance with a custom permitting such hiring,[83] or with the implied knowledge of the master or his subsequent ratification,[84] is entitled to the same protection as the servant; he is bound by the terms and conditions of his predecessor's contract,[85] and the fact that the employee receives his own regular wages does not affect the relation of the substitute to the master.[86] On the other hand, one who, with the right under his contract to work whenever he desires, has a private arrangement with a third person who acts as his substitute and looks alone to him for compensation, is, while at work, an employee under his contract.[87]

§ 5. Contracts of Employment

A contract of employment cannot arise without the consent of an alleged party thereto, and it has been held that such contract, when made without reference to the law of a particular place, is governed by the law of the place where the contract was made, at least where such place is the same as the place where the contract is to be performed.

The relation of master and servant arises out of contract, as discussed supra § 2, and a contract of employment usually involves the agreement of one party to render services or labor for the benefit of another, who in turn becomes obligated to pay a consideration therefor,[88] and the rights of an employer and an employee under an employment contract are correlative.[89] A contract of employment cannot arise against the will or without the consent of an alleged party thereto.[90]

What law governs. It has been held that a contract of employment is governed as to its construction and effect by the law with reference to which the parties in good faith intended to contract[91] and that a contract made without reference to the law of a particular place[92] is governed by the law of the place where the contract was made.[93] The lat-

Memorandum of salary paid

A contract, whereby employee of corporation agreed to give note for stock in corporation which agreed to pay employee an additional sum per year salary in excess of salary then being paid, was not an "employment contract" which created obligation on either party to continue employment at salary then being paid, the reference to regular salary being but a memorandum of salary, presently paid.—Gutknecht v. C. A. Lawton Co., 285 N.W. 411, 231 Wis. 413.

Contract or trade agreement

(1) "Contract" in labor law is a term the implications of which must be determined from the connection in which it appears; it does not necessarily connote a contract of employment.—J. I. Case Co. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 576, 321 U.S. 332, 88 L.Ed. 762.

(2) As discussed infra § 28 (37), negotiations between a union and management result in what is often called a trade agreement rather than in a contract of employment.

ter is undoubtedly true in so far as the place where the contract is made is the same as where it is to be performed,[94] or where the contract is to be performed in various jurisdictions.[95] Where, however, a contract is made in one place and is to be performed in another place it has been held that the law of the place of performance governs.[96]

Right of seniority. An employee has no inherent right to seniority in service, and can have only such rights as may be based on a contract or on a statute or administrative regulation relative thereto.[97] Inasmuch as seniority rights must be effective against the employer if they are to be effective at all, he must be a party to any contractual arrangement which creates them.[98] Where seniority rights do in fact exist as the result of contract they are not inconsistent with the employer's right to discharge an employee, but ordinarily they exist on the assumption of continuing employment.[99] It has been stated that there is no apparent reason why they may not be enforced in the courts by the application of the remedies usually employed in the enforcement of other legal rights.[1]

§ 6. —— Form and Validity

a. In general
b. Terms and conditions
c. Certainty
d. Contracts for permanent or life employment

a. In General

Like every other contract, a contract of employment arises out of a meeting of the minds of the parties; and, while mutuality of obligation and sufficient consideration are essential, in the absence of statute or arbitrary rule of law no specific formalities are essential. The contract may be void or voidable because of fraud or misrepresentation.

Like every other contract, a contract of employment arises out of a meeting of the minds of the parties,[2] with an offer on the part of one and an

Reality of consent
(1) The consent necessary to create a binding contract must be real.—Silbros, Inc. v. Solomon, N.J.Ch., 52 A.2d 534.

(2) However, one signing an employment contract and who knew that the document related to the terms of employment and who had an opportunity to examine the con-acceptance on the part of the other,[3] and it is essential that both parties understand the terms used in the same sense.[4] In the absence of statute or arbitrary rule of law, no specific formalities are essential.[5] Except as may be otherwise required by the statute of frauds, as discussed in Frauds, Stat-tract before signing it, is bound thereby notwithstanding he did not read it in the absence of a showing of fraud.—Silbros, Inc., v. Solomon, supra.

(3) A fortiori, in the absence of fraud, a party reading and signing an employment contract is bound thereby.—Clements v. Knighton, La. App., 1 So.2d 139.

Payment for service rendered, under a misapprehension as to the terms of employment does not affect the question as to the nature of the employment arrangement or agreement.—St. Louis Hay & Grain Co. v. U. S., Ct.Cl., 24 S.Ct. 47, 191 U.S. 159, 48 L.Ed. 130—Gorman v. U. S., 102 Ct.Cl. 260.

Construction of offer

A corporation's written offer of employment, prepared by its president, must be construed most favorably to offeree, and words of offer must be given meaning which corporation should reasonably have understood that offeree would put on them.—Noble v. McKinley, 72 N.Y.S. 2d 510.

In determining whether offer was accepted, so as to consummate contract, all surrounding circumstances should be considered.—Noble v. McKinley, supra.

Time, place, and mode of acceptance

A party making an offer of employment has a right to stipulate the time, place, and the mode of its acceptance, and, when the offer does so stipulate, it cannot be accepted in any other place or in any other manner.

Execution by master not essential

(1) A written employment contract executed in duplicate by the employee, of which one copy was delivered to, and accepted by, employer, has been held to be a binding contract, even though signed by employee only.—Knight v. Gulf Refining Co., 166 A. 880, 311 Pa. 357.

(2) So it has been held, where the parties have operated under a written contract, that the master will not be permitted to repudiate the contract on the ground that it was not executed by or for him.—Hollingsworth v. Robe Lumber Co., 45 P. 2d 614, 182 Wash. 74.

ute of § 62, or the parties themselves contemplate the execution of a written agreement,[6] such contract may be oral or written,[7] express or implied.[8] Thus one who is allowed to work in connection with the carrying on of a business, and is given reason to believe and bona fide believes that he is employed in that business, has a right to treat himself as an employee.[9]

Consideration; mutuality. It is equally essential that a contract of employment be supported by sufficient consideration;[10] mutuality of obligation is an essential element of every enforceable contract of employment.[11] While it has been held that a contract terminable by either party at will is not in-

Notarial act enjoining on employee knowledge and understanding of contract signed is unnecessary.—Red Star Yeast & Products Co. v. Hague, 157 N.E. 398, 25 Ohio App. 100.

6. Signing letter enclosing contract insufficient

Where employer and employee were negotiating for contract and employee signed proposed contract, employer's letter, stating that employer was sending two revised copies of proposed contract, and if contract as revised was satisfactory employee should execute both copies and return them so that they might be executed on behalf of employer, did not constitute the execution of enclosed contract on theory that letter and contract were so united as to constitute the signature to letter as subscribed, to both.—Price v. valid as unilateral,[12] it has also been held that mutuality is lacking when only one of the parties is bound to perform.[13] Thus it has been held that an agreement which depends for performance on the wish, will, or pleasure of one of the parties,[14] whether the employer[15] or the employee,[16] is unilateral and void for want of mutuality, at least in so far as it remains executory.[17] It has also been held, however, that the fact that an employer may at any time terminate the employment or change any of its terms does not preclude the existence of a valid contract[18] and that a contract is not void as unilateral because, although the employer is bound for a definite period, the employee may terminate it at pleasure.[19] Generally, where an independent consideration passes from the employee, in addition to the performance of service, the fact that the contract is terminable at the will of the employee does not impair its mutuality.[20] A contract is not necessarily lacking in mutuality because there is no express agreement on the part of the employee to serve, as such a promise is implied from his entering on the service[21] or even from his readiness and willingness to serve.[22]

Fraud and misrepresentation. Although a contract of employment induced by the false statements of the servant ordinarily is not void, but voidable at the option of the master,[23] for reasons of public policy this rule has been ignored and the contract treated as void, at least for some purposes;[24] and where an employee falsely assumes the name of a third person for the purpose of obtaining employment, in violation of a statute, it has been held that the contract is void.[25] So it has been held that one who obtains service by misrepresenting his age against a rule of the employer which forbids the employment of a minor does not become the servant of the employer, but a trespasser.[26] Fraud and misrepresentation by the employee will not ordinarily avail the employer, however, where he does not rely on the employee's statements but conducts his own investigation.[27] Fraud and misrepresentation inducing the execution of an employment contract are never presumed, but must be established by evi-

Indefinite agreement lacking mutuality

An executory agreement by an employer to pay an employee at a rate not specified for time when he did no work, without any corresponding agreement binding him to work for the employer even for a single day at an agreed rate of compensation, has been held to be too indefinite for enforcement, and so lacking in mutuality as not to support an action for breach of contract.—Davis v. dence,[28] and a party relying on such fraud and misrepresentation as part of his cause of action or defense has the burden of proving them.[29] Fraud inducing a contract of employment may be shown by circumstantial evidence.[30]

b. Terms and Conditions

A contract of employment may contain such terms and conditions as the parties see fit to make provided they are not illegal or unreasonable.

The contract must conform to, and not be in violation of, valid statutory provisions governing the terms and conditions of employment,[31] but it may contain such terms and conditions as the parties see fit to make provided they are not illegal or unreasonable.[32] In other words, subject to valid statutes designed to prohibit substandard conditions and unfair labor practices, wages, hours, and working conditions are the proper subjects of contract between the employer and the employee, and their agreements must be, and are, given full effect in the courts.[33] Particular provisions which have been held not illegal or unreasonable include provisions permitting the employer to terminate the employment at any time with or without cause,[34] permitting the employer to continue to use the employee's ideas and materials after the termination of the employment on payment of a stipulated compensation,[35] requiring employees to participate in a group insurance plan under which a part of the premiums therefor are paid by deduction from the employee's wages,[36] and making an employee's right to a bonus conditional on his continuous service for a stated period.[37]

c. Certainty

It is essential to the validity of a contract of employment that the nature and extent of its obligations be certain.

It is essential to the validity of a contract of employment that the nature and the extent of its obligations be certain.[38] A contract is not necessarily uncertain, however, because some of its terms must be fixed at a future time or by subsequent events,[39] and a contract is sufficiently certain if it may be rendered certain[40] or has been rendered certain by

Option as to compensation
Where plaintiff gave defendant alternative proposals under which plaintiff would manage defendant's hotel during a season and defendant expressed satisfaction with either or the performance of the parties under it.[41] As a general rule, it is essential that the contract specify the nature and extent of the services to be performed, the place where, and the person to whom, rendered, and the compensation paid,[42] and a contract which does not specify any of the essential terms is unenforceable and void.[43]

It has been held that a contract is not unenforceable as indefinite for the reason that the particular duties of the employee are not specified,[44] the minimum salary alone is specified,[45] the exact amount of allowances to be paid in addition to salary is not stated,[46] or the amount of a bonus,[47] or a per cent of the profits,[48] as additional compensation, is not capable of exact determination at the time of making the contract.

Duration. While it has been held that a contract is void for uncertainty which does not specify the period for its continuance,[49] it has been held that a contract of employment is not unenforceable on the ground of uncertainty because the precise period of its duration is not specified,[50] but is only approximated,[51] and a contract is not fatally indefinite merely because its duration is not fixed by the calendar, but by reference to the existence or happening of certain events, contingencies, or conditions.[52] Thus it has been held that a contract for as long a time as the employer should use patent rights assigned to it by the employee,[53] or for as long as the employee faithfully and diligently performs the duties of his employment,[54] or until such time as the employee should be physically incapacitated to work[55] is enforceable. Under a statute providing that a contract for the hire of services can only be made for a definite limited time, a contract under which a servant performs services in consideration of a promise to provide for her by will is invalid for lack of a definite term.[56]

d. Contracts for Permanent or Life Employment

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a contract for permanent or life employment, when based on good consideration additional to the services to be rendered, is valid and enforceable according to its terms.

A contract for permanent employment[57] or em-

both of the proposals and plaintiff entered on his duties, defendant could not defeat recovery by plaintiff for breach of contract on ground that no contract in fact existed because of indefiniteness, especially where plaintiff, in fact, undertook management of defendant's hotel under a third arrangement more favorable to defendant.—Edgewater Beach Corporation v. ployment for life[58] is not so vague and indefinite as to time as to be void and unenforceable because of uncertainty or indefiniteness. While it has been held that a contract for permanent employment[59] or employment for life[60] is not unenforceable because the only consideration for it, as far as the employer is concerned, is the employee's promise to render the service called for by the contract, some courts have apparently taken the view that such contracts, unless supported by good consideration in addition to the services to be performed, are not binding and enforceable as such,[61] but only as general indefinite hirings or hirings at will, as discussed infra § 8.

In any case, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, a contract for permanent employment or employment for life, when based on good consideration additional to the services to be rendered, is valid and enforceable according to its terms,[62] and not void for lack of mutuality because the employee is not bound to continue in the employer's service[63] or as against public policy.[64] Ordinarily sufficient consideration to support the contract is afforded by the adjustment of a bona fide claim, whether or not the claim is well founded;[65] by a release by an injured employee of his claim against the employer for personal injuries previously sustained, or by an agreement, express or implied, by the employee to forego his right to make a claim therefor,[66] provided the workmen's compensation

59. D.C.—Littell v. Evening Star Newspaper Co., 120 F.2d 36, 73 App.D.C. 409.
"When one who enters into a contract of employment, promises not only that he will give his service but also additional consideration—as, for example, by making an investment in the business . . . or by relinquishing an acknowledged right to recover for injury which he has suffered—such facts may be sufficient, in each case, to show the intent of the parties to enter into a contract for permanent employment. Some of the courts have reasoned from these cases that, to prove a contract of permanent employment, two considerations must be shown; that is, a consideration in addition to the services to be performed; and that in the absence of two considerations there can be no such contract. This misconception results from mistaking the form for the substance. . . . The meaning of the cases previously referred to is that where no such intent is clearly expressed and, absent evidence which shows other consideration than a promise to render services, the assumption will be that—even though they speak in terms of 'permanent' employment —the parties have in mind the ordinary business contract for a continuing employment, terminable at the will of either party."—Littell v. a. In general

In accordance with general rules of construction of contracts, regard is to be had to the intention of the parties as shown by the terms of the contract.

Contracts of employment are subject to the same rules of construction as other contracts,[76] and in construing them regard is to be had to the intention of the parties, as shown by the terms of the contract, taking into consideration the circumstances surrounding its making and the object had in view.[77] While, if the terms are clear and unambiguous, the court is bound to give effect to them,[78] the language used should be reasonably construed.[79] The contract is to be construed as a whole, if possible, and an effect given to the various parts consistent with all the language of the contract,[80] and it has been held that, where two contracts were made on the same day for the services of the employee, the two agreements should be construed as constituting one contract.[81] Where a contract is made in view of well established customs of the trade to which it relates, it is to be construed in the light of those customs.[82] If an employment contract is capable of two constructions, one of which renders it valid and the other void, the interpretation rendering it valid should be adopted.[83]

Practical constructions of parties. Where the contract is clear and unequivocal, it cannot be varied by conduct of one of the parties tending to place a different construction on it.[84] However, an ambiguous contract may be construed with relation to the conduct of parties subsequent to the execution of the contract,[85] and where, during the execution of a contract of employment, the parties thereto have accepted and acted on a certain interpretation of one of its provisions, a court will not, in litigation subsequently arising, adopt another in-

Hardship

The fact that application of the terms of employment contract might appear to inflict hardship on one of the parties does not warrant remaking of the contract by the court.—Gingsberg v. Reliable Linen Service Co., 290 N.W. 331, 292 Mich. 70.

Term "ability to pay," as used in agreement between sister and decedent which provided that decedent was to pay sister an agreed wage for services performed if and when decedent was able to do so and at some time in future after he had completed payment on certain investment, meant the ability to pay in the ordinary course of decedent's accustomed way of life, and not by liquidating his business, his life insurance, and the last of his clothing and personal effects.—Binzel v. Two instruments

Where employer retained first instrument which bore signature of employee but not employer's signature, and employee kept a second instrument which was signed only by employer, but parties thought both writings were substantially identical, both instruments should be construed together, at least to extent that the provisions of each did not exclude those of the other, in determining the terms of the employment contract.—Clements v. terpretation more favorable to one of the litigants.[86]

Construction against party preparing contract. Where an employment contract is ambiguous,[87] it will be construed most strongly against the party preparing it or employing the words concerning which doubt arises,[88] and this, of course, applies to contracts prepared by the employer,[89] and ambiguous language used by the employer will be given the meaning which the employer ought reasonably to have understood that the employee would put on it.[90] Moreover, it has been held that, where a contract contains coercive and harsh provisions bearing on the employee, it will be construed by the courts liberally in his favor.[91]

Writing and printing. An express written addition to the printed provisions of a contract is deemed to be significant of the intentions of the parties, and of governing force,[92] and printed provisions may be disregarded in construing a contract when it appears that a printed form was intended for use under other circumstances and is not reasonably applicable to the situation.[93]

Rules and regulations of employer. A regulation of the employer as to applications for employment cannot prevent the making of a contract without regard to such rule, or affect it when made,[94] and a rule adopted by the employer several years after the beginning of an employment does not form part of the contract of employment.[95]

b. Implied Terms

An employment contract includes not only what is expressly stated, but also what is necessarily implied from the nature of the relationship created, the language used, and the conduct of the parties. Usages or customs and rules of law may become a part of the contract.

An employment contract includes not only what is expressly stated, but also what is necessarily implied from the nature of the relationship created,[96] the language used,[97] and the conduct of the parties.[98] Also usages or customs prevailing in the particular employment and principles and rules of law applicable thereto become as much a part of the contract as though they were expressly incorporated or referred to therein.[99] Ordinarily the employee will be taken to have impliedly agreed to perform satisfactorily the work assigned to him,[1] and to be loyal, diligent, faithful, and obedient.[2] More specifically, the law implies that the employee will faithfully perform the duties reasonably required of him in the manner directed by the employer.[3] The court cannot read something into the contract, however, that is neither expressed therein nor implied from anything in the contract or from the surrounding circumstances,[4] and the implied obligation of the employee to be loyal and faithful to his employer does not prevent him from engaging in whatever activities he chooses outside of his employment as long as they are not inconsistent with his duties to his employer.[5]

Authority to employ assistants. Ordinarily a servant has no implied authority to employ assistants.[6] A servant's authority to employ assistants may be implied, however, from the nature of the work to be performed, from the general course of conducting the business of the master by the servant, or from the circumstances of the particular case,[7] and in case of an emergency where a servant is unable to perform the work himself it has been held that he may employ an assistant.[8]

c. Parties

A person expressly employed by an individual on behalf of another person, corporation, or other entity becomes the servant of the latter; whether or not a contract entered into by more than two parties is joint, several, or joint and several is dependent on the intention of the parties.

A person expressly employed by an individual on behalf of another person, corporation, or other entity becomes the servant of the latter,[9] and a contract of employment made through an employment agency, naming applicant, the employer, and the person authorizing the hiring, does not make the latter, but the one so named, the employer.[10] The addition of the word "trustee" to a writing signed by the employer does not, however, make the latter any the less an employer when the employee does not know whom the employer represents.[11] Although there may be a more or less complete identity in the stock ownership of two or more corporations, as long as they remain distinct legal entities, an employee of one is not to be regarded as an employee of the others,[12] but where the servant, although employed by one company, is with the knowledge and consent of the others acting for them also, the relation may be regarded as existing as to them.[13] Where two parties are jointly interested in a business, the presumption is that those employed in such business are the servants of both, although the actual employment and control are by one.[14]

Joint or several. Whether or not a contract of employment entered into by more than two parties is joint, several, or joint and several is dependent on the intention of the parties.[15]

Recognition of employer

Where first contract contemplated that defendant's personal liability as employer should cease on execution of trust which was to assume liability until formation of corporation which was to assume the liability, and after trust was executed a second contract referred to defendant as "Trustee under a certain Trust Agreement," and after formation of corporation plaintiff recognized corporation as his employer, defendant was not liable individually under second contract notwithstanding such contract provided that it superseded all previous contracts.—Patch v. intention of the parties.[16] Ordinarily the terms of the contract are controlling,[17] but if ambiguity exists therein the intent of the parties may be sought in the circumstances surrounding the transaction, including the situation and object of the parties,[18] and the practical construction placed on the agreement by the parties.[19] Where no time is fixed in a contract of employment at which the person employed is to commence work, the presumption is that he is to commence either at once or within a reasonable time.[20]

The duration of a contract for a definite period is not affected by a change in the duties required of an employee[21] or by the fact that the period specified is stated to be a probationary period,[22] nor is such a contract made indefinite by the fact that it may be terminated by reason of a condition subsequent,[23] and, when it appears to have been the intention of the parties to create an employment for a definite period, it will not be changed into an employment for a shorter period by reason of the fact that the salary is payable at specified intervals during the time fixed.[24] It has been held, where a servant employed on a monthly basis starts to work in the middle of a month, that payment on the first of the succeeding month makes the new month run from that date.[25]

A hiring for a specified sum for a named period may be construed as a hiring for the period named when there are other circumstances in the case supporting such construction,[26] and it will be so construed when the other circumstances in the case are such that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the intention of the parties was otherwise.[27]

b. General or Indefinite Hiring

Ordinarily a general or indefinite hiring is presumed to be a hiring at will, and according to some authorities the fact that the contract specifies a salary pro-

Consecutive weeks

Contract for a specified number of weeks is clearly intended as an undertaking to employ for consecutive weeks.—Mackenzie v. King, 30 Hawaii 230.

Period implied

A contract for employment of plaintiff as manager of defendant's business, giving him all of five years, if he chose to take it, within which to make his payment for a one-third interest in the business, was held to imply that plaintiff should have the right to continue in defendant's employ during full term of five years, unless he should elect sooner to pay purchase price for interest which he had agreed to buy.—Gregg v. Employment of instructor

A manufacturing company's employment of instructor in its technical training school at specified sum per month for no definite period of time was not a hiring at will, but by the month, in view of the nature of the services performed by an instructor.—Pryor v. Briggs Mfg. Co., 20 N.W.2d 279, 312 Mich. 476, 161 A.L.R. 699.

portionate to units of time which are commonly used for the purpose of accounting or payment does not of itself raise a presumption that the parties have agreed that the employment is to continue for the stated unit of time.

Where the contract of employment is general and indefinite and contains no provision respecting the duration of the employment, there is some diversity of opinion with respect to the duration of the employment.[28] The "English view," so called, tends to a construction establishing a contract for a definite term if this can be spelled out of the language used,[29] and this view finds some support in American decisions.[30] On the other hand, it has been stated that the "American view" tends toward a holding that the hiring is at will, unless the contrary be fairly plain,[31] and in the United States a general or indefinite hiring, or a hiring under a contract which does not specify a definite time or prescribe conditions which determine the duration of the relation, ordinarily is regarded as, or is presumed to be, a hiring at will.[32] This result does not, however, invariably follow,[33] and the presumption of a hiring at will is rebuttable.[34]

The duration of the employment under such contracts depends on the intention of the parties,[35] and each case must be determined on its own facts.[36] In ascertaining the intention of the par-

Contracts for permanent or life employment as general or indefinite hirings see infra subdivision c of this section.
Termination of contracts for indefinite term see infra § 31.

Under void contract for definite term

Where the parties enter into a contract for a definite term, but the contract is void, it has been held that an indefinite hiring results.—Brown v. Oneida Knitting Mills, 277 N.W. 653, 226 Wis. 662.

A contract prescribing the conditions which determine its duration, although not setting a date by reference to the calendar, is not an indefinite hiring terminable at will.—Deucht v. Storper, 44 N.Y.S.2d 356.

A hiring from month to month is time employment, as distinguished from employment at will.

ties, the court may consider customs affecting the employment,[37] the nature of the employment,[38] the construction placed on the contract by the parties,[39] and any other facts and circumstances showing their intention.[40]

The fact that the contract specifies a salary or wage proportionate to units of time which are frequently used for the purpose of accounting or payment, such as a month or a year, is evidence, in connection with other relevant facts, indicating that the agreement is for such unit,[41] and may, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, show or raise a presumption that the employment is to continue for the stated unit of time,[42] and such fact is often determinative,[43] but according to a number of authorities such fact does not of itself show or raise a presumption that the parties have agreed that the employment is to continue for the stated unit of time.[44]

A contract for a named sum per month for sixty days, an increase in the monthly salary for the next one hundred eighty days, and a further increase in the monthly salary thereafter has been held to create a month to month employment.—Red Star Yeast & Products Co. v. Hague, 157 N.E. 393, 25 Ohio App. 100.

In Michigan

(1) In an early case it was held that a telegram to the alleged employee stating, "You may come at once at salary of two thousand, conditional only upon satisfactory discharge of business," could not be relied on to make out a contract of employment for a single year, since the language used was just as consistent with a contract of employment for a term of years.—Palmer v. Marquette & Pacific Rolling Mill Co., 32 Mich. 274.

(2) In later cases, however, it was held that the fixing of a yearly salary was sufficient to establish a hiring for a year.—Southwell v. Parker Plow Co., 207 N.W. 872, 234 Mich. 292—Fuller v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 69 N.W. 492, 111 Mich. 221.

(3) This has been regarded as leaving open the question of whether a hiring for a monthly salary constitutes a hiring by the month.—Pryor v. Briggs Mfg. Co., 20 N.W.2d 279, 312 Mich. 476, 161 A.L.R. 699.

In Tennessee

(1) Supreme court has held that contract for hiring at specified sum per annum could not be construed as contract for longer than year.—Godson v. MacFadden, 39 S.W.2d 287, 288, 162 Tenn. 528.

(2) However, in an earlier case, court of appeals quoted rule stated in Corpus Juris "that the fact that a hiring is at so much per day, week, month, quarter, or year, raises no presumption that the hiring was for such a period."—American Nat. Ins. Co. v. Jackson, 12 Tenn.App. 305, 308.

Finding not disturbed on appeal

If from the facts referred to in the text, even standing alone, without any other evidence to impair its weight, the trial court finds a monthly or yearly hiring, corresponding to the rate of wages, it has been held that the inference so drawn cannot be disturbed on appeal.—Kellogg v. Additional and independent consideration, other than services to be rendered, may prevent an employment contract from being considered a hiring at will.[45]

c. Contracts for Permanent or Life Employment

As a general rule, in the absence of additional stipulations as to duration, or of a good consideration additional to the rendering of the services contracted for, a contract for permanent or life employment is no more than an indefinite general hiring or hiring at will.

As a general rule, "permanent employment," as used in contracts of employment, means steady employment, a steady job, a position of some permanence, as contrasted with a temporary job or a temporary employment.[46] Standing alone and by themselves, the words do not mean life employment[47] or employment for any definite period.[48] On the contrary, as a general rule, in the absence of additional stipulations as to duration[49] or of a good consideration additional to the rendering of the services contracted for,[50] a contract for permanent employment is no more than an indefinite general hiring or hiring at will, and this has been held to be true of a contract for life employment.[51] In other words, where the intent to enter into a contract for permanent employment, not terminable except pursuant to its express terms, is not clearly expressed, and there is no evidence showing consideration other than a promise to render service, the assumption will be that, even though the parties speak in terms of permanent employment, the parties have in mind merely the ordinary business contract for a continuing employment, terminable at the will of either party.[52]

The duration of the employment under such contracts, however, depends ultimately on the intention of the parties,[53] as shown by the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract, its subject, the situation and relation of the parties, and the sense in which, taking these things into account, the words used would be ordinarily understood,[54] and under some circumstances a contract for permanent employment will be held to contemplate an engagement to endure as long as the employer is engaged in the same nature of business and needs the services of the employee, and the employee is able and willing to do the work satisfactorily and gives no cause for his discharge.[55] Thus, where a consideration is given by the employee other than the services contracted for,[56] such as the release of a claim for damages,[57] or where the employee gives up a position or business in order to enter his new employment,[58] such facts may be sufficient to show the intent of the parties to enter into a contract to endure for the life of the employee or at least as long as he is able to do the work and there is work to be done. It has been held, however, that detriment sustained by the employee in preparing himself to accept the offered employment not mutually understood as being part of the consideration,[59] such as giving up a business or position,[60] is insufficient to show that the parties intended more than a general indefinite hiring or hiring at will.

§ 9. —— Modification or Rescission

a. Modification
b. Rescission

a. Modification

The parties to a contract of employment may change or modify it, provided a sufficient consideration moves between them. An employment terminable at any time is subject to modification at any time by either party as a condition of its continuance.

It is competent for the parties to a contract of employment to change or modify it, and thus by new conditions add to or qualify its terms,[61] provided a sufficient consideration moves between them.[62] A contract of employment cannot be modi-

Inducement

Where there was no evidence showing any declaration by the employee that he would not give up his present employment unless the employer would permanently employ him or any acquiescence by the employer to such terms, but evidenced indicated that his former employment was terminating, employment contract was not supported by any consideration requiring continuance of employment for any particular period of time.—Thacker v. Future employment

(1) Continuance of employment may constitute consideration for a retroactive modification.

Wyo.—Long v. Forbes, 136 P.2d 242, 58 Wyo. 533.

(2) Where parties, after agreeing on employee's weekly compensation, realized, at time they agreed to reduce compensation, that work had lasted for a longer period than had been contemplated, and employee in part reduced compensation as a good will gesture toward employer with view to subsequent business dealings, employee's assignee in suit against employer was not entitled to amount of compensation under original agreement, on ground that employee's voluntary agreement to reduce compensation was without consideration.—Quinn v. McCurdy, Tex.Civ.App., 187 S.W.2d 595, refused for want of merit.

Mutual consent

Seniority rights cannot be altered except by a contractual arrangement to which the employer is a party.—Carver v. Brien, 43 N.E.2d 597, 315 Ill.App. 643.

Modification held not induced by duress, because employee's refusal to agree would mean discharge, since exercise of legal right does not constitute duress.—De Villafranca v. International Trade Exhibition, 122 So. 889, 168 La. 635.

Misrepresentations cannot affect a modification when they were not relied on by the person to whom they were made.—Wilson v. Galena-Signal Oil Co., 119 A. 471, 275 Pa. 355—39 C.J. p 48 note 68.

Employer held to have right to change salesman's territory in the absence of a showing that the contract deprived him of that right, and an oral conversation between the manager of the employer and the salesman, wherein the manager assured the salesman that the salesman would be given at least six months' notice before the manager would let him go, did not constitute a contract not to change the salesman's territory without notice or effect change of the existing contract of employment.—Farley v. Universal Mills, Tex.Civ.App., 116 S.W.2d 488.

Substitution of new employer

(1) A contract of employment cannot be changed by the substitution of a new employer without the knowledge and consent of the employee.

Submission to physical examination

Where an employee on reporting for work was told that it would be necessary for him to pass a physical examination, he had the option of standing on the contract as originally made or assenting to the new stipulation, and, where he voluntarily submitted to an examination, he assented to the new stipulation.—Birmingham Electric Co. v. Protest ineffective

Where contract of employment provided for termination on notice, and employer sent employee a letter stating that in future compensation would be lowered in certain respects, agent was put to election whether to accept modification of contract embodied in letter, and he ratified such modification by continuing in employment, although under protest, and accepting lowered compensation.—L. G. Balfour Co. v. Brown, Tex. Civ.App., 110 S.W.2d 104.

the employment for a short time after announcement of a change.[70]

Necessity of writing. As a general rule, a written contract of employment,[71] whether sealed or unsealed,[72] may be modified by parol, where neither the old[73] nor the new[74] contract is within the scope of the statute of frauds, and this is true, notwithstanding a provision in the old contract requiring changes to be made in writing.[75] Under a statute in effect so providing, however, a written contract may be altered only by a contract in writing or an executed oral agreement,[76] and it has been held that an oral agreement is not executed within the meaning of such statute while reciprocal obligations of the parties remain to be performed in the future.[77]

Merger of oral contract in written contract. In the absence of fraud, a written contract of employment merges a prior oral contract,[78] and it has been held that, where, after an oral agreement has been partly performed, a written agreement is executed specifying the terms of employment, such written agreement should be deemed to embody the contract relating to past, as well as to future, services.[79]

Change in nature of relationship. The relationship of employer and employee may be changed to another relationship, such as an independent-contractor status, by an abrogation of the provision for control by the employer, through either an express agreement, or an agreement implied from circumstances demonstrative of a mutual abandonment of it,[80] but clear and convincing proof is necessary.[81]

Operation and effect. An agreement modifying a prior employment contract is a substitute for the original one in so far as it alters, modifies, or changes it.[82] A new contract with respect to the employment does not, however, supersede the old contract and destroy its obligations, except in so far as the two are inconsistent, when it is evident that the parties did not intend the new to supersede the old, but intended it as supplementary thereto.[83]

b. Rescission

A contract of employment cannot be rescinded except for cause, unless by mutual consent.

Wis.—Gutknecht v. C. A. Lawton Co., 285 N.W. 411, 231 Wis. 413.

Burden of proof
Where the employer alleges an oral modification of a written contract made in his interest, the burden is on him to establish such modification.—Dunbar v. Orleans Metal Bed Co., 82 So. 889, 145 La. 779.

Degree of proof
The existence of an oral contract changing the terms of a prior written one must be clearly and positively shown, and, where written employment contract was contract at will, authorizing employer to change salary at any time, letters to employee in subsequent years, increasing salary, and superior's subsequent statement that contract was "renewed" for year, did not, as matter of law, change contract to contract for year.—Knight v. Gulf Refining Co., 166 A. 880, 311 Pa. 357.

Oral contract not terminated
Where contract was reduced to writing after employment commenced, the written contract did not terminate the oral contract so as to entitle the employee to a separate accounting for profits for periods before and after writing was executed.—Anagnosti v. Almy, 147 N.E. 854, 252 Mass. 492.

Provision abrogating prior contract
(1) An employment contract which contained provision to effect that all prior communications between the parties should be abrogated, and that the contract when approved constituted the agreement between the parties, has been held to abrogate a prior contract entered into between the parties.—Burns v. Reliance Life Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, 12 S.E.2d 509, 122 W.Va. 708.

(2) So, it has been held that a provision that "This letter on your accepting and signing and returning a copy to our office will become our final agreement and void all other agreements now in existence" voided and terminated a prior contract of employment rather than merely modified it.—Lidenberg v. Anchor Stove & Range Co., 291 N.W. 512, 207 Minn. 341.

39 C.J. p 48 note 74.

Merely keeping still and going on earning a living after a new agreement does not require a finding that the employee consented to the surrender of rights already accrued under the old contract.—McDonald v. Fitch, 183 N.E. 848, 281 Mass. 528.

A contract of employment cannot be rescinded except for cause, unless by mutual consent.[84] One who has been induced by fraud to enter a contract may rescind it,[85] and, when the contract is breached or repudiated by one of the parties before or pending the performance of service, the other may elect to treat the contract as rescinded.[86] In order to justify rescission on such ground, the breach must affect the substance of the contract, or the repudiation must be positive, unequivocal, and absolute.[87] The contract may be rescinded for a cause which would justify a discharge from, or abandonment of, service,[88] but the refusal to account for profits earned under a contract has been held not to warrant rescission where the contract has otherwise been fully executed.[89] A written contract may be rescinded by an oral agreement.[90]

A modification of a contract may be abrogated in turn, and, when both parties have mutually disregarded it, it has been held that their rights are to be determined under the terms of the original contract,[91] but it has also been held that, where a contract superseding a prior contract of hiring is abandoned by mutual consent, the prior contract is not reëstablished.[92]

After rescission, the contract and each of its terms and provisions cease to be a subsisting or enforceable obligation.[93] A party cannot avert the consequences of his rescission on the ground that the rescission was ineffectual because of his own laches,[94] especially where the other party has relied on his rescission,[95] but an agreement canceling a prior contract of employment may be rescinded on the ground of fraud or duress in a proper action brought therefor.[96]

§ 10. —— Renewal or Continuance

a. In general

b. Option and privilege of renewal

a. In General

As a general rule, where one enters into the service of another for a definite period, and continues in the employment after the expiration of that period, without any new contract, the presumption is that the employment is continued on the terms of the original contract.

As a general rule, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, where one enters into the service of another for a definite period, and continues in the employment after the expiration of that period, without any new contract, the presumption is that the employment is continued on the terms of the original contract,[97] and provisions and restrictions

Offer of restoration of benefits

Where an employer, in an action against him for commissions, proceeds as for a rescission of the contract for fraud, an offer of restoration of benefits received is unnecessary when the employee's services are alleged to have been valueless.—Morgan Munitions Supply Co. v. Studebaker Corp., 168 N.Y.S. 37, 180 App. Div. 530.

A breach or repudiation does not of itself abrogate the contract, but merely gives the nondefaulting party a right to treat contract as discharged.—Panich v. Curtis, Owen, Fuller Corporation, Mo.App., 124 S. W.2d 619.

87. Fla.—Croker v. Powell, 156 So. 146, 115 Fla. 733.

Substantial breach not shown

Where employer, having prior right to services of employee, who had privilege of working elsewhere when not needed by employer, waived such right on some occasions but employee recognized obligation to report for duty when called, complied substantially with such obligation, and worked for him at least half of employee's working time during entire contract period, there was no such substantial nonperformance or breach of contract as would justify rescission thereof by employer.—Vincent v. forming essential parts of the contract, although collateral to the employment itself, continue in force.[98] A change in one of the terms does not destroy the presumption as to the other terms.[99] Thus, a mere change in the contract with respect to the amount of salary will not affect the applicability of the rule.[1]

While it has been held that, where the original term is for more than a year, a continuance in employment will not support a presumption of a renewal for the full period of the original term,[2] but only of employment from year to year thereafter,[3] where the hiring is for a definite term less than a year, it has been held that a renewal for that term will be implied,[4] but there is authority to the contrary.[5] Unless the original contract was for an entire year and the service rendered under it continued for at least a year, no presumption of renewal for another year on the same terms arises by reason of continuance in the same service.[6]

It has been held, however, that the presumption will not arise where the original contract is absolutely void,[7] or where the services rendered after the expiration of the term are of a different char-

Statutory codification

It has been stated that the statute was intended to codify the common-law rule as it had been developed and interpreted at the time of the enactment of the statute.—Otten v. San Francisco Hotel Owners Ass'n, 168 P.2d 739, 74 Cal.App.2d 341.

Same wages

Both prior to and since the adoption of the statute, it was held that, where one continues employment after the expiration of the contract, the fair presumption is that both parties understood that the same salary is to be paid.—Nicholson v. Patchin, 5 Cal. 474—Schneider v. Oakman Cons. Min. Co., 176 P. 177, 38 Cal.App. 338—Perry v. J. Noonan Furniture Co., 95 P. 1128, 8 Cal.App. 35.

In Louisiana

(1) It has been held that, after the expiration of a contract of employment for a fixed period, the employment continues for an indefinite period, unless expressly renewed for another fixed period, or unless the custom in such employment is for a fixed time.—Fletcher v. Crichton, 164 So. 411, 183 La. 551—Russell v. White Oil Corporation, 110 So. 70, 162 La. 9—National Automatic Fire Alarm Co. v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co., 39 So. 738, 115 La. 633.

(2) Thus, the employment may be considered as renewed for a fixed period where the nature of the employment and the general custom relative thereto, as well as the facts and circumstances of the particular case, show that the intention of the parties was that the employment should continue for a definite period.—Fletcher v. Crichton, supra.

(3) Earlier decisions apparently held otherwise.—Sullivan v. New Orleans Stave & Heading Co., 11 So. 89, 44 La.Ann. 787—Lalande v. Aldrich, 6 So. 28, 41 La.Ann. 307—Alba v. Moriarty, 36 La.Ann. 680.

Principle governing yearly contract applied

It has been held that, where one was employed in the spring for the balance of the calendar year, the principle applicable to employment by the year, that is, implied renewal for another year, could fairly be invoked.—Virginia Canners' Exch. v. Scheidt, 119 S.E. 56, 137 Va. 452—39 C.J. p 50 note 92.

5. In New York

(1) It has been held that, where a contract of hiring is for a term less than a year, there is no presumption that the parties agreed to its renewal for the same period by reason of the continuance of the employment or holding over for a short time after the expiration of the term.—Moskowitz v. Mawhinney, 137 N.Y.S. 903—Barnes v. Summit Silk Mfg. Co., 113 N.Y.S. 977—Caldwell v. Caldwell Co., 88 N.Y.S. 970.

(2) It has been stated, however, "in passing, although not necessary to the determination . . . that, if the first hiring was for a definite term of six months, a renewal for that term would be implied."—Wood v. Miller, 138 N.Y.S. 562, 565, 78 Misc. 377.

Hiring by year or shorter period as acter from that called for by the contract,[8] and it may be rebutted by showing a new agreement or that a different hiring was in fact intended by the parties.[9] A new contract may arise, although it is shown under an agreement which is in terms an express renewal of the original contract.[10] Also, when, at the close of a definite term, negotiations are pending for a new contract, it has been held that the law will not conclude them by a presumption of an implied contract,[11] and when such negotiations have been in fact concluded by the parties, and a new arrangement agreed on, it is immaterial that, although contemplated, the new agreement has not been reduced to writing.[12]

Rights and obligations under former contract. Where separate and independent contracts of employment for successive periods of time contain no statement of a settlement of prior dealing with the parties, there is no presumption that their mutual claims up to the date of making a contract had been adjusted.[13]

b. Option and Privilege of Renewal

Employment contracts may validly give either party the option or privilege to extend the term.

Employment contracts may validly give the employer[14] or the employee[15] the option or privilege to extend the term annually or for a term of greater or lesser length. Where a contract provides that it may be terminated at the end of a fixed period at the option of either party on notice, and that otherwise it is to remain in force for a definite period, the failure of the parties to exercise the option is a renewal of the contract with all its provisions.[16] The fact that the contract expressly provides for a renewal for a definite period on the failure of the parties to give notice of discontinuance does not preclude subsequent renewals based on the continuance of the employment, after the expiration of the renewal term provided for by the contract.[17] Where a contract of hiring for a year provides that it may be renewed for three years at the election of the employer, by notice in writing, it has been held that it is immaterial whether he exercised his election in the manner prescribed in the agreement, where he continues the employee in his employment, and the continuance of the employment after the expiration of the original period will be for a like period.[18]

d. Damages

a. In General

An employee may maintain an action against his employer for appropriate damages when the contract is breached or repudiated by the employer.

Just as the employer may recover damages from his employee, as discussed infra § 77, for any failure on the part of the employee to perform the duties devolving on him under the employment contract, so the employee may maintain an action against his employer for damages when the contract is breached or repudiated by the employer.[19]

Such action may be maintained whether the breach or repudiation occurs before[20] or pending[21] the performance of the service. While it has been held that it is necessary that the employee tender his services as a condition precedent to a right of action against the employer for breach of contract,[22] it has also been held that where an employee is ready and willing to perform services contracted for, and the employer has repudiated the contract, the employee need not thereafter tender his services or keep himself in readiness to perform.[23] His only further duty is to use reasonable care and diligence in entering into other employment of the same kind, and thus reduce the damages.[24]

It is no defense to an action for breach of contract that the period of employment was uncertain,[25] that the employee breached the contract after the employer's default,[26] or has failed to perform an act or condition, the performance of which was prevented by the employer,[27] nor is it any answer to such an action that at a time subsequent to the alleged contract the master had employees enough, without plaintiff, to do all his business.[28] On the other hand, the action cannot be maintained where the contract relied on is void,[29] or has been rescinded by mutual agreement,[30] or where performance is prevented by acts or events for which neither party is responsible;[31] nor can it be maintained where the employer has not actually breached or repudiated the contract.[32] Further, as a general rule, whatever

Conduct not constituting breach

The employer's silence when employee asked him what he intended to do about carrying out his contract to pay plaintiff for personal services does not constitute an "anticipatory breach" of the contract which would would be a good reason for discharging a servant, as discussed infra § 42, would be an equally good reason for refusing to take him into one's service after having engaged to do so,[33] but the fact that the contract gives the employer an option to discharge an employee should his services or conduct prove unsatisfactory has been held not to entitle the employer to repudiate the contract prior to the commencement of service.[34]

Waiver and estoppel. Where, with full knowledge of his rights, the conduct of an employee is wholly inconsistent with reliance on his contract of employment, he will be deemed to have waived his right to sue for a breach of the contract.[35] It has been held, however, that an employee does not waive his right to rely on a breach of contract by the employer as the basis of an action for damages merely because he continues to work after the breach;[36] nor does such action on his part work an estoppel.[37]

Questions of fact in an action for breach of an employment contract ordinarily are for the jury.[38]

b. Pleading

Generally, a declaration or complaint in an action for breach of an employment contract must clearly allege the substantial facts which are essential to the right of recovery. A slight variance is immaterial.

General rules of pleading in actions for breach of contract, as discussed in Contracts §§ 533–564, have been applied in actions for breach of employment contracts.[39] It is not enough to show a right of action against defendant that the promises or covenants of the respective parties be fully set out, with averment of performance on the part of plaintiff.[40] Plaintiff must in due form assign such breaches of defendant's promises or covenants as are relied on as grounds for a recovery of damages,[41] and the breaches assigned must be coextensive with the import and effect of the contract.[42]

The declaration, complaint, or petition should show the making and existence of a valid and enforceable contract between plaintiff and defendant, the right of plaintiff and the obligation of defendant thereunder,[43] a breach or repudiation thereof,[44] or a tender of services[45] and refusal to accept them,[46] and the damages flowing therefrom.[47] While it has been held that the employee must aver willingness and ability to perform at the time of the alleged breach,[48] it is not necessary for him to allege readiness and willingness to perform the services throughout the term during which he bound himself to serve,[49] and it has been held that, where plaintiff alleges that defendant refused to employ him, it is unnecessary to allege that he was ready to accept the employment.[50]

While the declaration, complaint, or petition need not set forth what evidence is to be introduced or relied on as to matters of detail,[51] or anticipate matters of defense,[52] and should not state mere legal conclusions,[53] it must clearly allege the substantial facts which are essential to the right of recovery,[54] and for failure, the trial or appellate court may take notice of such fatal defect, although the sufficiency of a declaration is not tested by demurrer.[55]

Issues, proof, and variance. In an action for breach of a contract of employment, only such matters may be considered, or relied on by the parties for recovery or defense, as are put in issue by the pleadings and supported by the evidence at the trial.[56] Where plaintiff avers that he was "ready at the day" to perform all the covenants on his part to be performed, he cannot recover on proof that defendant had consented that the time should be enlarged and that he was ready at the day substituted,[57] and plaintiff is not entitled to recover under an allegation that, but for the contract entered into with defendant, she could have obtained employment at other places, where there was no evidence that, at the time she contracted with defendant, there was any contract or request for employment with other parties.[58] A slight variance between the pleading and proof, however, is not necessarily fatal.[59] The variance between an allegation that an oral contract was entered into on a certain day and proof that the actual contract was made prior thereto, and that on that day plaintiff was notified in writing by defendant that the latter was ready for plaintiff to go to work, may be disregarded where no prejudice is shown.[60]

Judgment on pleadings. Where there is no substantial issue of fact involved, the court may, under some statutes, render judgment on the pleadings.[61]

him to prove the making of a binding contract,[63] and the essential terms thereof.[64] The burden of overcoming the presumption that a hiring for an indefinite period is a hiring at will, as discussed supra § 8 b, is on plaintiff.[65] On the other hand, the employer has the burden of proving affirmative defenses.[66] Although there is authority to the contrary,[67] it has been held that the burden is on the employer to prove mitigation of damages or that plaintiff did earn, or by reasonable diligence could have earned, wages in other similar employment.[68] There is no presumption that one suffers a loss by changing his place of residence.[69]

(2) Admissibility

Any competent evidence relevant to a material issue is admissible in an action for breach of an employment contract.

Any competent evidence relevant to a material issue is admissible in an action for breach of an employment contract.[70] Conversely, evidence not relevant to a material issue is inadmissible.[71] If a written contract is ambiguous or obscure in its terms, so that the contractual intention cannot be understood from a mere inspection of the instrument, extrinsic evidence of the facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract is admissible to show the intention of the parties.[72] In an action on a written contract of service for one year, with a right of renewal by plaintiff for another year, unless there should be given written notice of any cause of dissatisfaction, evidence of causes of dissatisfaction other than those alleged in the required notice is not admissible.[73] In an action alleging a breach of a contract made in consideration of the release by plaintiff of a claim for damages, evidence of knowledge of defendant's representative that defendant's attorney had given an opinion that defendant was not liable under such claim is inadmissible in the absence of evidence that plaintiff was present and had knowledge of the opinion.[74] Evidence tending to prove plaintiff's discharge is properly admitted under a complaint alleging a refusal to furnish him with employment.[75]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

In an action for breach of an employment contract, the plaintiff must establish his right of recovery by a preponderance of the evidence, while the defendant has a like duty of establishing affirmative defenses.

parties at the time the contract was entered into as a probable result of its breach,[81] and his actual damages may properly include expenses incurred or expenditures made in anticipation of, or preparation for, performance,[82] but remote consequences of the employer's breach of contract do not afford an adequate basis for an award of damages,[83] and damages accruing after the contract has expired or been terminated cannot be recovered.[84] It has been held that, where a contract provided that it might be terminated by the employer on notice and the payment of liquidated damages, the refusal of the employer to allow the employee to enter on the service was, in contemplation of law, the termination of the contract under its provision, and the employee's damages were liquidated at the amount provided for by the terms of the contract.[85] Where a contract specifies no time of service, and the hiring is at a daily rate, the measure of damages has been held to be the price of one day's service.[86]

Punitive damages. It has been held that punitive damages cannot be recovered for breach of a contract of employment unless the breach is accompanied by a fraudulent act.[87]

§ 12. Evidence of Employment

a. Burden of proof and presumptions
b. Admissibility
c. Weight and sufficiency

a. Burden of Proof and Presumptions

Ordinarily the burden of proving the existence of the relationship of master and servant rests on the party relying on such relationship as part of his cause of action, but there is a presumption that one performing work for another is an employee of such other.

Ordinarily the burden of proving the existence of the relationship of master and servant rests on the party relying on such relationship as part of his cause of action,[88] but, when he has adduced sufficient evidence to establish the relationship prima facie, the adverse party then has the burden of producing evidence in rebuttal.[89] Where a change of masters is claimed by the employer, the burden is on him to show that the alleged change was made with the servant's assent.[90] There is a presumption that the relationship of master and servant exists where the alleged servant is working on the premises of the master,[91] or is driving a vehicle belonging to the master,[92] and the presumption may exist where one performs work and labor for another without being on his premises or using his vehicle.[93] A party denying the existence of the relationship has the burden of overcoming the presumption by proof,[94] although, if the evidence produced by the party relying on the presumption disputes or negatives the presumption, the presumption cannot avail in his favor.[95]

b. Admissibility

Generally speaking, any competent evidence tending to prove or disprove the relationship of master and servant is admissible.

(2) So, where contract entitled either party to rescind on stipulated notice, it has been held that the filing of the petition was the equivalent of notice and plaintiff could not recover damages accruing after filing of petition.—Indian Refining Co. v. McCombs, 191 N.E. 919, 47 Ohio App. 425.

95. Idaho.—Joslin v. Idaho Times Pub. Co., 53 P.2d 323, 56 Idaho 242.

The existence of the relation of master and servant is to be proved, as any other like question,[96] and, generally speaking, any competent evidence tending to prove or disprove the relationship is admissible.[97] The contract may be established by the correspondence of the parties.[98] Evidence of the surrounding facts and circumstances is admissible to show the character of an ambiguous agreement, and the intention of the parties.[99] Evidence that the employee had been paid by a person other than the alleged employer,[1] or had not been on the alleged employer's pay roll for a number of years,[2] is admissible to disprove the relationship. Although an employer's liability policy is inadmissible as evidence on the question of negligence, it is competent on the question of the existence of the relation of master and servant.[3]

Practice or custom. Where there is no express contract for a definite term, evidence of the custom of the parties themselves in prior years of employment,[4] or even of similar employment of others,[5] may be admissible to show the term of employment. Evidence of custom is inadmissible, however, to contradict the terms of an express contract,[6] and evidence of the practice of one to make contracts only in writing is inadmissible on the issue of whether the alleged contract was in writing or in parol.[7]

Contract implied from holding over. Where an employee continues in the employment after the expiration of a definite term, both the original contract[8] and the circumstances surrounding its making[9] are admissible in evidence to show the character and terms of the contract of continuing employment.

c. Weight and Sufficiency

The party relying on the existence of the relationship of master and servant as part of his cause of action must establish such fact by a preponderance of the evidence.

In the exercise of its police power a state may impose wholesome and reasonable regulations on the relation of master and servant.

The purpose of a constitutional provision authorizing the passage of laws providing for the comfort, health, safety, and general welfare of all employees is not to define the word "employees"[18] or to create a rule that has been nonexistent,[19] but rather is to allay all doubt as to the right of the legislature to enact subsequent legislation respecting those who are employed by others[20] and to empower the legislature to pass laws that will promote the general welfare of employees by improving their working conditions.[21] So too a constitutional provision authorizing the passage of laws to protect the health and safety of employees in factories, mines, and railroads does not, by implication, limit the legislative power or prevent the passage of laws of the same character relating to other industries.[22]

In the exercise of its police power[23] a state may impose such wholesome and reasonable regulations and restrictions on the relation of master and servant as are conducive to the public welfare,[24] health,[25] or safety.[26] The object of labor legislation is to protect persons employed in industry;[27] but such legislation, although enacted for the benefit of employees, is also enacted in the interest of the public at large.[28] In dealing with the relation of employer and employee, a state legislature has necessarily a wide field of discretion in order that there may be suitable protection of health and safety, and that peace and good order may be promoted through regulations designed to secure wholesome conditions of work and freedom from oppression.[29] The state, however, cannot interfere in a private employment and stipulate the terms of the service to be rendered,[30] nor can it in terms destroy the property right of an employer.[31]

Regulations governing employees' organizations and discrimination are discussed infra §§ 28 (65)-28 (68).

Interests of society

The rights of employers and employees to conduct their economic affairs and to compete with others for a share in the products of industry are subject to modification or qualification in the interests of the society in which they exist.

Exclusion from statute

A statute relating to employer-employee relations may be deemed to exclude the operation of hotels, including dining apartments, although the same duties are performed by the employees of independent restaurants engaged in the business of feeding the public in the same manner as hotels.—Burrow v. Kapfhammer, 145 S.W.2d 1067, 284 Ky. 753.

Delivery of copy of contract to employee

It is constitutionally permissible to legislate so as to provide that a written contract of employment shall be void unless, at the time of making it, a copy thereof, signed by the employer or his authorized representative, is delivered to the employee.—In re Opinion of Justices, 166 N.E. 401, 267 Mass. 607, 63 A. General conditions of labor

A state legislature has power to enact legislation regulating general conditions of labor, at least as to women and children, in any industry in the state.—McGrew v. Industrial Commission, 85 P.2d 608, 96 Utah 203.

Policy furthering desirable industrial relations is within ambit of proper exercise of legislative power.—Isolantite, Inc., v. United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, C.I.O., 29 A.2d 183, 132 N.J. Eq. 613.

Prevention of disputes

(1) It is a matter of general public concern and well within the police power of the state to attempt to prevent disputes between employees and employers not only in manufacturing concerns and factories but also in public utilities, whether privately or publicly owned and operated.—Local Union No. 876, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers v. State of Michigan Labor Mediation Board, 293 N.W. 809, 294 Mich. 629.

39 C.J. p 56 note 81.

"Employer" and "employee." Definitions of "employer" and "employee" contained in one article in a labor code, and in terms limited to that article, can have no effect on a section contained in another article of the code.[32] A statute regulating employment and defining "employer," but not expressly including the state, does not apply to the state.[33] The word "employee," as used in some statutes regulating the relation of master and servant, cannot be defined in the strict contractual sense,[34] and such statutes apply to employees whose contracts of employment are terminable at will.[35] Under some statutes an employee means a mechanic, working man, or laborer working for another for hire,[36] but the provisions refer to manual laborers only.[37]

Public boards, commissions, or officers. Under some labor laws an industrial board may make rules limited to carrying out the purposes of the law,[38] or the only function of a commissioner in respect of the employment of minors and women may be to examine into such employment and the observance of statutory regulations, to investigate complaints, and to report violations to the prosecuting officer.[39] Before an industrial commission may determine and prescribe general standards and conditions of labor by employees, a full and public hearing at which sufficient evidence is taken to support the necessary findings of fact may be required,[40] and the findings must embrace the facts which are needed to sustain the order.[41]

Terms and consequences of contract of employment. It is one of the functions of a state to decree the legal consequences that shall attach to a contract of employment made within the state, regardless of a stipulation of the parties.[42] Statutes which preclude a contract for personal service from being binding or enforceable for a longer term than a prescribed number of years are accorded effect.[43] While such statutes are for the benefit of the employee,[44] they are closely identified with the public interest[45] and are in the nature of police regulations or expressions of public policy to prevent those compelled to seek employment from tying themselves up by indefinite or unlimited agreements that may seriously affect or restrict their ability to develop by a desirable change of employment.[46] They may not be waived by the employee;[47] but they do not render void ab initio a contract for a longer term than that prescribed[48] or prevent the employee, with the consent of the employer, from voluntarily performing the excessive part of the contract.[49]

(2) Particular Classes of Employees

Statutes which are valid and binding and are to be given effect when applicable include "full crew" statutes affecting freight trains and statutes prohibiting the employment of aliens on public work. Child labor laws are highly remedial in character and are to be liberally interpreted.

In a particular case involving a "full crew" statute affecting freight trains, the evidence may be insufficient to show that operating conditions and the cost of complying with the statute have so changed since the enactment of the statute as to make application thereof to the railroad in question arbitrary and unreasonable.[50] Statutes forbidding employment of aliens on public work are valid.[51]

Children. Child labor laws, being highly remedial in character are to be liberally interpreted in order to effect their beneficent objects.[52] The determination of the question whether a particular child activity is "work" within the meaning of child labor laws depends altogether on the circumstances of each case,[53] and there is no fixed and universal rule which will solve the diversified questions which can arise under different sets of facts.[54]

Miners. Statutory and official regulation of the employment and conduct of miners is discussed in the C.J.S. title Mines and Minerals § 236, also 40 C.J. p 1138 note 81–p 1139 note 2.

(3) Offenses and Prosecutions

In a prosecution for violation of a statute regulating the relation between employer and employee, the burden is on the state to prove facts bringing the case within the statute.

Under some statutes regulating the relation between employer and employee, and making a violation thereof a misdemeanor, only the owner of an establishment is criminally liable,[55] while under other statutes an agent may be subject to criminal prosecution.[56] The burden is on the state to show facts bringing the case within the statute;[57] and defendant is entitled to any reasonable doubt as to the construction of the statute where it does not plainly cover the case.[58] Criminal liability and prosecution for violation of state statute regulating hours of service are discussed infra § 15 a.

Second offense. Where punishment is based on the number of violations of any of the provisions of the act, it is not necessary, in order to warrant an increased punishment as for a second offense, that a previous violation should have been of the same character;[59] but a person may not be punished as a second offender where he is not charged as such either in the original information or in any information filed in proceedings following conviction.[60]

b. Federal Statutes

Statutes enacted for the purpose of eliminating labor conditions detrimental to workers have been held valid.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 201–219, which sets up a comprehensive legislative scheme for preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of certain products and commodities produced in the United States under labor conditions which fail to conform to standards set up by the act, has been held constitutional.[61] It is Pa.—Commonwealth v. McKaig, 29 Pa.Dist. & Co. 629.

Purpose of laws
Child labor laws are intended to protect children, in their healthful development to adult age, from exploitation by business and industry, and to insure to them, in the interests of the public welfare, that condition of freedom from debilitating labor in which alone they can develop into fully efficient economic and social units of the state.—Commonwealth v. McKaig, supra.

Skating exhibition

Giving required information to labor commissioner
In prosecution under statute prohibiting securing of labor in state for one's use in another without notifying commissioner of labor, it is not sufficient for state to show that defendant secured labor within state for his use in another, but it should also be shown that he did so without giving commissioner information required under statute.—Gleaton v. State, 191 S.E. 926, 55 Ga.App. 875.

remedial in nature,[62] having been enacted for the humanitarian purpose of eliminating labor conditions detrimental to workers engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for such commerce,[63] and therefore should be liberally construed.[64]

The provisions of the act relating to wages and overtime compensation are discussed infra §§ 151–160.

The child labor provisions of the act, which do not prohibit the employment of child labor, but instead prohibit the shipment, or delivery for shipment, in interstate commerce of goods produced in an establishment where oppressive child labor is employed, manifest an intent to keep the arteries of interstate commerce free from the products of child labor,[65] and they establish a national policy and a national standard, rather than a mere additional sanction for the enforcement of state child labor laws.[66] The purposes of such provisions are to protect adult employees against competition of minors, as well as to protect children against harmful labor, and hence are both economic and sociological.[67]

National Industrial Recovery Act. Provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act relating to employers and employees were accorded effect according to the express language thereof where they were not regarded as unconstitutional.[68] Also provisions of a code approved for a particular industry under the act became by implication a part of a contract of employment by an employer in that industry;[69] and it was not permissible for the employer, employees, or a labor union to violate such provisions by waiver or consent.[70] An employee could not

Plain meaning

The meaning of the act must in the first instance at least be sought in its language, and if that is plain and the act is constitutional the sole function of the court is to enforce it.—Fleming v. Hawkeye Pearl Button Co., C.C.A.Iowa, 113 F.2d 52.

§ 15. Hours of Service in General

a. State statutes
b. Federal statutes

a. State Statutes

In the absence of broader constitutional authorization, a state law regulating the hours of labor of employees, other than public employees and employees on public works, is valid when, and only when, it is a proper exercise of the police power in that it has for its object, and bears a direct and reasonable relation to, the protection of the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public or the employees affected, and does not violate constitutional limitations or guaranties.

A state law regulating the hours of labor of employees may be enacted and enforced under the police power,[72] without offense to constitutional limitations,[73] where the object of the enactment is to protect the public health, safety, morals, or general welfare, and the statute is adapted to that end,[74] or where there is a reasonable relation between the hours of labor and the health, safety, morals, or welfare of the employees within the purview of the statute,[75] especially where the employees are, by the nature of their employment, subject to extraordinary perils.[76] However, in the absence of a constitutional provision expressing a contrary policy, a state's police power to regulate the hours of labor for work performed within its borders is not general or unlimited;[77] a regulation of such hours, in order to be valid, must tend reasonably to advance the public interest;[78] and it is invalid where it has no direct relation to the health, safety, or morals of the public[79] or the employees whose working hours are curtailed,[80] or where it violates one or more constitutional limitations or guaranties.[81] Such a regulation will not be sustained as an exercise of the extraordinary power of government, in times of emergency, to combat unemployment where there is nothing in the statute to indicate a purpose to relieve unemployment or which would induce judicial belief that it would have any substantial effect on unemployment.[82]

Construction and application generally. A state statute limiting the hours of employment should be liberally construed to effect its object to protect the health of employees and promote the general welfare;[83] and an exception or exemption should be strictly construed.[84] Under some statutes of this nature an employee has no right to waive the restriction,[85] which is imposed for the benefit of the community and not for the exclusive benefit of employees;[86] but a differently worded statute has been construed to permit an adult workman to agree to work in any employment for a longer or shorter period each day than the maximum number of hours prescribed.[87] Provided the statute is otherwise applicable and the employee is within its terms,[88] the regulation applies where the relation of employer and employee, rather than some other relation, such as that of lessor and lessee, exists.[89]

Offenses and prosecutions. The penal provisions of some statutes limiting the hours of employment are so broadly worded as to be applicable to an employee as well as to the employer;[90] but the employees or servants expressly mentioned in a penal provision in connection with an agent are deemed to be limited to those belonging to the same class of persons as an agent, that is, that class of persons who stand in place of the owner, lessee, or operator, and have something to do with employing, superintending, or directing other persons.[91] An information for violation of the law must negative statutory exceptions.[92] Where a corporation is charged with a violation of a penal statute, the state must establish its guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and show that in working excessive hours the employee did so under the direction of the corporation, and not voluntarily.[93] Under an act regulating the hours of work in a manufacturing establishment, and making a violation thereof punishable, there can be but one violation in any one day, whether all or only part of the employees are worked more than the prescribed hours.[94]

One day of rest each week. A statute requiring employers operating designated business enterprises to allow every employee at least twenty-four consecutive hours of rest in each calendar week is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state.[95] Such a statute relates to the health of the worker,[96] and, under it, an employer must not compel an employee to work more than six days per week,[97] although an employee may have no right of action for violation of any of its provisions.[98] It is applicable when the establishment operated by an employer is within its terms,[99] but not otherwise,[1] even though the establishment is not expressly exempted.[2] In construing it, the court should endeavor to ascertain its fair and reasonable meaning and avoid a construction which either extends or limits its provisions beyond that which was obviously intended.[3]

Rule or order of commission. Some statutes are construed not to authorize a public service commission to fix the hours of service of drivers for private motor carriers[4] or a railroad commission to fix the hours of duty of railroad employees at depots and stations.[5] However, other statutory provisions, which have been held valid,[6] are construed to authorize the promulgation of administrative orders prescribing maximum hours of employment.[7] Under some statutes a commission's order determining and prescribing maximum hours must be preceded by a full and public hearing at which sufficient evidence is taken to support the necessary findings of fact,[8] and the findings must embrace the facts needed to sustain the order.[9] The order is subject to judicial inquiry as to its reasonableness.[10]

b. Federal Statutes

Various federal statutes have been enacted with respect to the hours and work of employees, some of which statutes have been held unconstitutional.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 201-219, is not merely a wage statute.[11] The detrimental labor conditions to which the act is directed include long hours,[12] and the act was intended and expected to maintain health.[13] The act is intended to fix a standard of hours of work per week for laborers engaged in handling goods in, or producing goods for, interstate commerce[14] and to prevent the shipment in interstate commerce of certain commodities produced in the United States under labor conditions, as respects hours, which fail to conform to the standard set up by the act.[15] However, the act does not limit the number of hours which an employer engaged in interstate commerce may require his employees to work during each week,[16] and the hour provisions of the act do not become a part of an employment contract made without reference thereto;[17] but a provision of the act has been held to prohibit an employer from breaching a contract for the purpose of increasing hours of employment.[18]

The construction and application of the Fair Labor Standards Act, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 201 et seq, with respect to wages and overtime pay are discussed infra §§ 151 (1)-151 (35). The Federal Hours of Service Act is discussed infra §§ 18-23, and statutes relating to public employees or employees on public works are discussed infra § 17.

The Adamson Law, 45 U.S.C.A. § 65, declaring that, in contracts for labor and service, eight hours shall be deemed a day's work, and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation of railroad employees actually engaged in the operation of trains, does not deprive employer and employee of the right to agree between themselves on the hours to be served.[19] A provision therein expressly excepting railroads independently owned and operated and not exceeding one hundred miles in length is accorded effect according to the congressional intent, manifested thereby, to except short-line independent railroads[20]

Bituminous Coal Conservation Act. Provisions of the federal Bituminous Coal Conservation Act relative to the fixing of maximum hours of labor have been held unconstitutional.[22]

The National Industrial Recovery Act obligated only the employers to comply with the maximum hours of labor approved or prescribed by the president, and did not impose on the employees the obligation to accept the maximum hours of labor thus ordained.[23] The provisions of the act, and of a code, attempting to regulate hours of labor were held to be without constitutional sanction and void[24] as well as ineffective to impose any liability on an employer independent of a voluntary contract.[25]

§ 16. —— Women and Children

A statute reasonably regulating or limiting the hours of employment of women or children is a valid exercise of the police power and will be given effect when applicable.

Generally a state legislature may constitutionally regulate or limit the hours of labor of employed women.[26] Provided it is reasonable,[27] a statute limiting the number of hours per day or per week, or both, a woman may be employed or permitted to work in certain industries or establishments, or prohibiting her employment on Sunday or during certain hours at night in such industries or establishments, is a valid[28] exercise[29] of the police power. Such a statute is intended to protect the health of the women employees affected[30] and of the public generally,[31] and sometimes the legislature also has in mind the prevention of immorality.[32] The regulation or limitation is not for the benefit of employees only, but is also for the benefit of the public generally;[33] it may not be waived by a single employee;[34] and a contract to violate it is illegal and unenforceable.[35]

Such a statute will be accorded effect when it is applicable,[36] but not otherwise.[37] Likewise an applicable exception or exemption will be given effect;[38] but an exemption which is not in fact ap-

Employment

The method of payment is not controlling, but may be important, in determining whether the relation between the persons in question is that of employer and employee or of lessor and lessee.—Commonwealth v. Weinfield's, Inc., 25 N.E.2d 198, 305 Mass. 108.

Restaurant

Under statute prohibiting the employment of women to work in mercantile or manufacturing establishments on Sunday except cafeterias and "restaurants," the employment of a woman to work in the restaurant department of a drug store

plicable is unavailing,[39] and the court will not transcend judicial construction by holding that there is an implied exception.[40]

Particular statutes may be violated by employment longer than the maximum prescribed in respect of hours per day,[41] hours per week,[42] or days per week;[43] but a prohibition of employment during certain hours is, of course, not violated by employment during other hours.[44] Provided a penalty therefor is provided by statute,[45] a violation warrants prosecution and conviction on a sufficient indictment or information[46] and adequate evidence.[47] Failure of an inspector of employment records to make daily reports to the governing body of the municipality, as required by statute, does not preclude prosecution;[48] and, since an excuse for violation is not a defense,[49] evidence to show such excuse is not admissible.[50]

Order of public commission. When not authorized by statute, an order of a state welfare commission prohibiting the employment of women in mercantile establishments after a fixed time of the day is null and void.[51]

Children. A statute reasonably regulating or restricting the hours of employment of children is within the police power of the state and free from constitutional objections.[52]

§ 17. —— Public Employees; Employees on Public Works

A statute limiting the hours of labor of persons employed by or on behalf of the government or any of its political subdivisions, or employed by contractors or subcontractors on public works, is within the power of the legislature to enact.

A state legislature has power to enact a statute limiting the hours of labor of persons employed by, or on behalf of, the state or any of its political subdivisions, or employed by contractors or subcontractors on public works of the state or any of its political subdivisions.[53] Although enacted for the

which department also contained a soda fountain did not constitute a violation of the statute; and fact that drug store employed men to work on Sunday in other departments could not be considered either by way of aggravation or extenuation of charge on which prosecution was based.—State v. Seithel, 21 S.E.2d 195, 201 S.C. 1.

Permissible overtime

The statute is not violated where the case is within a provision permitting limited overtime.—People v. Elite Steam Laundry, 234 N.Y.S. 157, 226 App.Div. 35—People v. Marlin-Rockwell Corporation, 234 N.Y.S. 220, 133 Misc. 741.

Elimination of railroad grade crossing

Statutory provision regulating hours of work of laborers employed by railroads in eliminating railroad grade crossings, for cost of which state or its divisions is proportionately liable, is valid.—Long Island R. Co. v. Department of Labor of State of New York, 177 N.E. 17, 256 N.Y. 498.

Prior to adoption of constitutional provisions on the subject, statutes limiting the hours of labor on public works were held unconstitutional in benefit and protection of labor,[54] a statute of this nature is directed as much to the employee as to the state or a political subdivision,[55] it becomes a part of every contract of employment between a laborer and the state or political subdivision employing him,[56] and an agreement contrary to the statute is void in the absence of an emergency.[57] As properly construed,[58] constitutional or statutory provisions restricting the hours of labor of public employees or employees on public works are given effect when applicable,[59] but not otherwise.[60]

Although either an agent of the state[61] or an agent of a contractor[62] may be punished for a violation of a law making it a misdemeanor to employ laborers on public works for longer than the prescribed hours, such a statute only imposes good faith and diligence on the part of the contractor, and it does not make him guarantee against every possible accidental and unintentional violation of the provision.[63] In order to authorize a conviction, it is essential that defendant shall have had some control over the laborer,[64] and where the contractor has sublet a part of the work to an independent contractor he will not be responsible for the acts of such independent contractor in requiring workmen to work more than the permitted hours.[65]

A federal statute limiting the hours of work of laborers and mechanics on public works of the United States or the District of Columbia, except in cases of extraordinary emergency, is within the power of congress to enact and is constitutional[66] and mandatory.[67] It will be accorded effect when it is applicable,[68] but not otherwise.[69] An extraordinary emergency may not be a continuing one so as to suspend the operation of the law during the entire life of the contract.[70] A contractor for public works of the United States, who intention-

Reasons for enactment
A statute fixing eight-hour working day for manual or mechanical laborer employed on behalf of the state or its subdivisions was enacted for two reasons, the health of the laborer and the distribution of labor. —City of Glendale v. Dixon, 75 P.2d 683, 51 Ariz. 206.

Punishment

(2) However, it has been held that a statute establishing the number of hours which shall constitute a day's work for cities and other governmental subdivisions does not prohibit a special agreement between the city and its employees for a longer day's work.—Woods v. ally permits laborers employed thereon to work more than the prescribed hours, intentionally violates the provisions of an act prohibiting such action, although he acted under the mistaken assumption that an excepting clause was applicable.[71] Where there is a separate offense in the case of each laborer required to work excessive hours, a criminal information against a contractor for violation of the statute must set out the names of, or otherwise identify, the persons alleged to have been unlawfully employed so that accused may meet the charge intelligently.[72]

§ 18. Federal Hours of Service Act

The Hours of Service Act, limiting the hours of service of certain employees of common carriers engaged in transportation by railroad from one state to another is a highly remedial statute and should be liberally construed to effectuate its purpose of promoting safety in railroad operation and protecting the lives of employees and passengers.

Despite the fact that it provides a penalty for violation thereof,[73] the Hours of Service Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 61–64, limiting the hours of service of employees actually engaged in, or connected with, the movement of trains of common carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property by railroad from one state to another or in, to, or from the District of Columbia or a territory, is a highly remedial statute and should be liberally construed in order to effectuate its purpose,[74] which is to promote safety in railroad operation and protect the lives of employees and passengers by preventing the danger arising from undue fatigue and excessive mental and physical strain usually resulting from remaining too long at an exacting task.[75] The courts are required to give effect to all provisions of the act unless they are hopelessly irreconcilable.[76] While the carriers must use diligence to observe the hours of service of their employees,[77] the exercise of reasonable diligence or due care on their part is not an excuse for nonperformance, since the statute imposes an absolute duty.[78] Also the fact that excess service was in violation of the general rules of the carrier[79] or of the instructions of a superior officer[80] is not a defense. It is not essential to a violation that excessive service shall have been required or permitted by an officer or agent having the duty of supervising and regulating hours of service,[81] as the statute expressly enlarges the general rule under which a corporation is usually chargeable only with the knowledge of certain classes of officers and agents.[82]

Construction in war times

§ 19. —— To Whom Statute Applies

a. In general

b. Employees using telephone or telegraph for train order purposes

a. In General

In order to be within the application of the Hours of Service Act a carrier must be a common carrier by railroad and an employee must be actually engaged in, or connected with, the movement of a train.

The Hours of Service Act is applicable to any common carrier by railroad engaged in interstate commerce.[83] On the other hand, a carrier must be a common carrier to be within the application of the act,[84] and, while the agent of a common carrier and itself a common carrier may be liable for the penalty under the act,[85] the employees of an agent which is not itself a common carrier are not within the provisions of the act.[86] Whether a carrier is a common carrier within the meaning of the act does not depend on whether its charter declares it to be such or on whether the state of incorporation so considers it, but on what it does.[87]

The term "employees," within the meaning and application of the act, means persons actually engaged in, or connected with, the movement of a train[88] other than the crew of a wrecking or relief train.[89] The statute may be applicable to employees on a work train[90] or to employees assisting in the moving of cars in yards.[91] Where a servant is employed by two railroads, either or both may be liable for requiring or permitting excess service.[92]

b. Employees Using Telephone or Telegraph for Train Order Purposes

Effect is accorded, in cases within their application, to provisions of the Hours of Service Act prescribing limitations of hours of service for employees transmitting or receiving train orders by telephone or telegraph, and differentiating between towers, offices, places, or stations operated only during the daytime and those operated continuously day and night.

The purpose of a provision in the Hours of Service Act that no operator, train dispatcher, or other employee who, by the use of the telegraph or telephone, dispatches, reports, transmits, receives, or delivers orders pertaining to or affecting train movements shall be required or permitted to be or remain on duty for a longer period than nine hours in any twenty-four hour period in all towers, offices, places, and stations continuously operated night and day, nor for a longer period than thirteen hours in towers, offices, places, and stations operated only during the daytime, is to deal with all telegraph offices through which interstate train orders are transmitted;[93] and the provision also includes every sort of place where train orders are handled.[94] Employees within this provision are not restricted to those whose duties primarily involve the use of telegraph or telephone in connection with train orders,[95] but all who regularly, by the use of telephone or telegraph, receive or deliver orders per-

Matters involved

The meaning of "office, place, or station" within act does not depend on foot measure, but involves also the character of work performed, its scope, to what applied, how work is done, and whether, consistently with remedial object of act, it is naturally separable or unitary and continuous.—U. S. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., supra.

taining to the movements of trains are included.[96] A yardmaster is within the provision where he gives orders or directions, pertaining to, and affecting the movement of, trains, and uses the telephone for that purpose,[97] but not where his telephone messages are not orders and are not conclusive on the tower man.[98]

A company does not avoid a violation by an arrangement under which the services of on operator are shared with another carrier.[99]

Continuous operation night and day. It is not indispensable to the continuous operation of an office night and day, within the meaning of the act, that the office be operated or kept open continuously every hour or minute of the day or night[1] or that the person transmitting or receiving train orders by telephone or telegraph be in the office at all times,[2] nor is the question whether an office, place, or station is continuously operated during the day and night to be determined by the number or frequency of train orders that may be handled during a given period.[3] The night and day provision may not be frustrated by a severance of work and calling two places of performance distinct stations where there is in fact an identity of service.[4]

§ 20. —— Interruption of Continuity of Service

In order to interrupt continuity of service, a release of an employee from duty must afford a substantial opportunity for rest during a definite period of time.

Under the provisions of the statute relating to employees generally and making it unlawful for the carrier or its officers or agents to require or permit an employee to remain on duty longer than sixteen consecutive hours, or, where he has been on duty continuously for sixteen hours, again to go on duty until he has had at least ten consecutive hours off duty, or, where he has been on duty sixteen hours in the aggregate in any twenty-four hour period, to continue or again go on duty without having had at least eight consecutive hours off duty, there may, as a matter of law, be periods of duty with intermissions between, provided the aggregate of such periods does not exceed sixteen hours and there are at least eight consecutive hours off duty in any twenty-four hour period.[5] Whether particular intermissions are such as the law will recognize depends on their character as periods of substantial rest;[6] and a release of an employee from duty will not interrupt the continuity of service within the statute unless it is definite and certain as to period of time and substantial and opportune as to period of rest.[7] Also it has been held that a release from duty so as to justify a deduction of time must have been given by some officer or agent having authority to give it.[8] A release from duty may interrupt continuity of service where it is absolute and there is no contingency that, during the period thereof, the employee may be called on to perform any kind of service;[9] but, in order for a release to have this effect, the employee must be free to come and go at will and the release must not be so restricted that complete enjoyment thereof may be hampered by fear that the employee may, during the time thereof, be wanted by the employer at some particular place in connection with regular work.[10]

The limitation, as to hours, is not to a specific duty or class of duties, but to the employee, and it is a violation of the act to require or permit the remaining on duty of the employee for a longer time than the prescribed hours, although such duty for a part of the time has no connection with the employee's usual duty embraced within the terms of the statute,[11] and this is so whether such other work preceded[12] or followed[13] his usual work, and regardless of the fact that it was not the custom of the carrier to enforce such additional work[14] or of the fact that the employee worked contrary to instructions.[15]

Train order operatives. While the provision limiting the number of hours of service of train order operatives in any twenty-four hour period contemplates either aggregated or consecutive hours of service,[16] and is not violated where two separate periods of service do not, in the aggregate, exceed the prescribed maximum,[17] a company does not avoid a violation of the act by dividing the hours of service of an operator into two periods, where the aggregate hours exceed the prescribed maximum.[18] The words "any twenty-four hour period" should be given their literal meaning of any twenty-four consecutive hours or the twenty-four consecutive hours following any point of time;[19] they do not refer to a period beginning when an employee usually commences work.[20] In determining whether particular service is permissible, the twenty-four hour period is the twenty-four consecutive hours immediately preceding and including the service in question.[21]

§ 21. —— Reports

The filing of a report of excessive hours of service has been held to be mandatory.

The filing of a report of excessive hours of service has been held to be mandatory,[22] and the liability of a carrier to a penalty for failure to comply is discussed infra § 23 a.

§ 22. —— Emergencies and Other Happenings Excusing Violations

A carrier is not subject to penalties for excessive hours of service in the case of casualty, unavoidable accident, act of God, or delay arising from a cause not known and not forseeable when the employee left a terminal; but, notwithstanding casualty or the like, the carrier must use diligence to avoid a violation of the statute and must avail itself of a reasonable opportunity to relieve an employee from further excessive hours of service.

The proviso of the act declaring that its provisions shall not apply in the case of casualty, unavoidable accident, act of God, or a delay where the cause thereof was not known to the carrier, or its officer or agent in charge of the employee, at the time the employee left the terminal, and could not have been foreseen, extends to all employees, including telegraph operators or train dispatchers.[23] Penalties under the act will not accrue for such excess service as is the proximate result of casualty, unavoidable accident, or an act of God.[24] A cause, however, which will excuse a carrier must be one which was not only not known, but which could not have been foreseen, and it will be liable to the penalty for excessive hours resulting from accidents which might occur in the ordinary operation of railroad trains, and which might have been anticipated.[25] Although the mere fact that the company has knowledge of a casualty that may result in the delay of subsequent trains, and necessitate excessive hours of service for the employees of such latter trains, does not in itself deprive it of the excuse of such casualty,[26] nevertheless the company is bound to use all reasonable diligence to avoid a violation of the statute, and will not be excused from liability where it has had, and failed to avail itself of, a reasonable opportunity to relieve the employee from further hours in excess of the statutory maximum.[27] Thus, although an unavoidable accident or casualty has occurred after a train has left its terminal, the crew cannot be permitted to continue to the end of their particular run, if excess hours will be thereby necessitated when the carrier has an opportunity to relieve them at a division point.[28]

Emergency. The word "emergency," as used in the statutory provision that, in case of emergency, operators and like employees transmitting or receiving train orders by telephone or telegraph may be permitted to remain on duty four additional hours in a twenty-four hour period on not exceeding three days in any week, is not synonymous with "casualty," "unavoidable accident," or "act of God" as used in another provision of the act.[29] It refers to an unusual or abnormal condition which is beyond the carrier's control and beyond its reasonable power to remove or overcome,[30] and which creates a pressing necessity or exigency, calling for immediate action or remedy;[31] but, although it does not require the emergency to be an extraordinary one,[32] it does not include exigencies arising from ordinary mistakes and negligences which happen in the practical operation of railroads.[33] Whether or not the sudden illness of a coemployee is an emergency depends on whether or not it is coupled with inability in the exercise of proper care, to obtain a substitute employee.[34] The duration of an emergency is dependent on the facts of each case and is not limited to one week.[35]

§ 23. —— Penalties

a. In general

b. Actions to recover

a. In General

A carrier incurs a statutory penalty by violating the Hours of Service Act, or by failing to make a report of excessive hours of service as required by an authorized order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but matters in mitigation may be considered in determining the amount of the penalty to be imposed in a particular case

The carrier incurs a separate penalty for each employee kept on duty beyond the prescribed hours by reason of the same delay of a train.[36] However it has been held that the good faith of defendant in arranging periods of rest which were insufficient to break the continuity of service, and avoid the act, may be considered as a reason why a heavy fine should not be imposed.[37] Also the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission approved defendant's operation of its railroad in requiring an employee handling train orders to work excessive hours does not estop or preclude the government from recovering the penalties incurred by a viola-

"End of the run"

In construing the term as applied to a train crew the court said: "It does not appear that the word 'terminal' has been judicially defined. According to the usage of railroad men in the United States . . . each train crew is assigned by the officers of the company to a definite, fixed run, beginning and ending at fixed points or places on its line of railroad; and, in my judgment, these fixed beginning and ending points of a given run for a given crew are the 'terminals' of that run within the meaning of the word 'terminal.' . . . In the usage of railroad men there are different 'runs' for different train crews, and also different runs for different employés on the same train, and the run of an engineer on a passenger train might be different from the run of a conductor or brakeman. There may be one run for a freight crew and another run for a passenger crew, and these runs may not be, and usually are not, coterminous, and one run or several runs for freight crews may lie between the terminals of the run of a single passenger crew, and each of these runs has its own terminals."—U. tion of the act, but may be considered in mitigation of such penalties.[38]

In respect of reports. Where the pertinent statute is mandatory as to the carrier's liability in case of a failure to make reports of excessive hours of service, as required by an authorized order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the court is without jurisdiction to consider matters in mitigation, in order to justify a reduction of the penalty in such a case.[39] However, it has also been held that a railroad company permitting operators to work a greater number of hours than prescribed by statute and failing to make a report is liable to but one penalty for each employee, and not a further sum per day for each of the days the reports have been in default where the omission was made in good faith.[40] An unintentional omission, in a report duly filed, of excessive hours of employment, has been held not to render the company subject to a penalty.[41]

b. Actions to Recover

An action to recover a penalty for violation of the Hours of Service Act is a civil action in which it is incumbent on the government to plead and establish facts showing prima facie a violation of the statute, and in which it rests on defendant to plead and prove facts excusing a violation. Questions of fact are for the jury to determine; but it is for the judge to determine the penalty to be imposed.

Actions to recover penalties for violations of the Hours of Service Act are civil actions.[42] The complaint need not negative all possible legal excuses.[43] The excuses for nonapplication of the law contained in the proviso of the act constitute separate and affirmative defenses which must be specially pleaded[44] and are not available under a general denial.[45]

Issues, proof, and variance. Where affirmative defenses are pleaded under the Hours of Service Act, the proof should bring the case clearly within the letter and spirit of the statutory proviso.[46] Evidence will be considered in defense of an action, although not pleaded, where it appears that by consent of court and counsel the case was tried as though the matters to which the evidence related were within the issues.[47] The negligence of defendant in not providing relief for the crew of a train delayed by an unavoidable accident is in issue, although not charged or pleaded.[48]

Evidence. The burden is on the government to establish the facts essential to recovery;[49] but, where the complaint alleges and the answer admits that defendant required or permitted its employees to remain on duty longer than the consecutive hours permitted by the statute, a prima facie case is established;[50] and, where it appears from the evidence that a train was away from its terminal on a regular trip, the delay constitutes a prima facie violation of the act.[51] The burden of proof is on defendant to show facts defeating liability within the proviso of the act relating to casualty and like matters.[52] To this end defendant has the burden of showing that the excess service was the necessary result of the cause claimed to justify it[53] and that the carrier exercised the requisite diligence to relieve the employees and prevent service on their part in excess of the statutory maximum.[54]

Evidence is admissible on the part of the government to show daily occurrence of accidents similar to those claimed by defendant to be unavoidable;[55] but evidence is inadmissible on the part of defendant to show what changes in methods, practices, and properties it had made to enable it, in the exercise of reasonable care, prudence, and foresight, to meet the new conditions created by the statute and to secure compliance therewith.[56]

Questions for jury. The jury are to determine what constitutes night operation,[57] and whether a delay was in fact unavoidable or could have been prevented by due care is a question for the jury,[58] as is the question whether, after an unavoidable accident, defendant used the degree of care required to avoid a violation of the act.[59] It is for the jury to determine whether releases of a train crew from duty were for such substantial and opportune periods of rest as to constitute interruption of their hours of service[60] or whether they were mere subterfuges resorted to in order to evade the act.[61] It is for the judge, and not the jury, to determine the penalty to be imposed for a violation of the act.[62]

Review. A carrier cannot urge on certiorari that a delay necessitating excessive hours was caused by an unavoidable casualty where the question was raised only by a request to direct a verdict for defendant.[63]

§ 24. Place for Work

Statutes requiring stairways, washrooms, ventilation, protection from inclement weather, or other things conducive to safe and healthful places of work for employees are generally upheld. Orders of public boards or commissions in this connection are also upheld when they are reasonable and within the authority conferred by law on such boards or commissions.

It is a proper and reasonable exercise of the police power to regulate the use and enjoyment of property for the protection of the health and safety of employees.[64] Thus a statute requiring the owners and operators of mines, mills, foundries, and other like places of employment to provide washrooms for their employees is constitutional,[65] and it is not an objection to the validity of such an act that it applies only to places where a certain number are employed[66] or that the act provides that the requirement shall become operative only on the request of a certain number of the employees.[67] So also a statute is constitutional which requires the ventilation of factories, workrooms, or other places of work,[68] vestibules for street railway employees,[69] or the furnishing of maps or plans for the working of mines;[70] but a statute requiring the manufacture, repair, or alteration of metals or merchandise by methods productive of poisonous or noxious fumes or dusts to be conducted in rooms lying wholly above the surface of the ground has been held unconstitutional.[71] In pursuance of its object to provide for the health and safety of employees, the legislature has the right to provide for the inspection of places of employment.[72]

An order of a state board, commission, or commissioner relative to a place for industrial work, such as an order relating to stairways, washrooms, or industrial homework, is valid when it is reasonable,[73] is within the authority conferred by a valid statute,[74] and is supported by the requisite finding of facts,[75] even though there is an inadvertent misnomer in the order[76] or the commission did not require a city to be made a party to the proceedings.[77] The order must be definite[78] and sustained by the findings.[79]

Construction, application, and enforcement. The purpose and intent of such statutes are given due consideration by the courts;[80] and a person may be convicted on sufficient evidence of his violation of a statute;[81] but the statute, or a regulation adopted thereunder, will not be accorded effect where it is not applicable;[82] and a person may not be convicted of violating the statute where such statute, although imposing a requirement, does not impose the duty of complying therewith on such person[83] or where the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction.[84]

Effect on civil liability. A statute requiring the employer to furnish lockers and washrooms for the convenience of the employees does not relieve the employer from civil liability for the value of wearing apparel, deposited in such lockers and destroyed by fire through the negligence of the employer, where the employees are free from contributory negligence proximately causing the damage.[85] Liability of the master for personal injuries to servant is discussed infra § 171.

§ 25. Machinery, Appliances, and Safeguards

A master's duty to exercise reasonable care to provide his servant with reasonably safe instrumentalities and safeguards against personal injuries is a proper subject of statutory regulation; and, within the scope of the authority conferred on it by statute, a state department may make a reasonable order, rule, or regulation requiring certain safeguards for workers.

The legislature may regulate a master's duty to exercise reasonable care to provide his servant with reasonably safe instrumentalities and safeguards or

Procedure where issues determined in prior proceeding

The board may, under a statute, confirm a previous determination without a hearing if issues raised have been determined in the prior proceeding; but the court will send the matter back to the board for a hearing on request of workmen who are attacking the order, where prior proceeding was one brought by employers instead of workmen, and a federal statute created new conditions in the industry, which did not exist at time of promulgation of order or at time of determination of prior proceeding.—Dote v. protective devices against personal injuries or occupational diseases.[86] So also an order, rule, or regulation of a state department treating certain places of employment as factories,[87] and requiring certain safeguards for workers therein,[88] may be within the power of the department to make; but the court is authorized to determine the reasonableness and validity of the rule or order[89] and will hold it invalid when it is unreasonable.[90]

A statute of this character is designed to protect persons laboring in manufacturing establishments while in the performance of any duty, whether ordinary or exceptional and occasional.[91] Under a federal statute, and rules and regulations promulgated thereunder, each use of a locomotive after the time for inspection has passed without any inspection having been made is a separate offense for which a penalty attaches.[92]

§ 26. Employment Agencies

When not transcending constitutional limitations, a state statute regulating private employment agencies is valid as an exercise of the police power, and must be complied with in cases within its application; but a commissioner administering the law must not exceed his statutory powers.

When kept within constitutional limitations,[93] a state statute regulating private employment agencies may be upheld as an exercise of the police power.[94] However, since the conduct of an employment agency is a lawful business[95] not inherently dangerous to the public health, safety, morals, or welfare,[96] the legislation may not be prohibitory, rather than regulatory, as by denying the right to charge a fee for services in securing employment.[97] While some statutes regulating the fees chargeable by employment agencies have been held invalid,[98] especially where the maximum fees prescribed are so unreasonably low as to make the statute prohibitory or confiscatory,[99] other statutes have been held not invalid.[1]

A valid statute regulating employment agencies must be complied with[2] unless it is not applica-

Action for commissions under contract may not be maintained by an

ble[3] or a particular employment bureau is within an express exemption.[4] A penal provision of the statute will be strictly construed in favor of employment agencies until such time as the legislature clearly makes a contrary direction;[5] but in equity a theatrical employment agent will not be permitted to assert his noncompliance with the statute in order to avoid payment of a commission to a talent scout and thereby unjustly enrich himself.[6] A statutory definition of "employment agency" or "employment agent" will be accorded effect;[7] but the true import of such definition must be sought in the light of the statute taken as a whole.[8] An "employment agency" has been judicially defined as one for the brokerage of labor for a fee paid by the applicant for employment or by the prospective employer.[9] In the absence of restrictive words, any definition of the term includes the employment of laborers to work for another either in or beyond the state.[10]

The acts of a commissioner in administering the law will be upheld where they are within his statutory powers,[11] but not where they are in excess of such powers,[12] as where he in effect assumes the power to declare legislative policy and create standards.[13]

§ 27. Coercion

Some statutes prohibit employers from coercing employees with respect to matters specified therein.

In several jurisdictions statutes have been enacted prohibiting employers from coercing employees with respect to matters specified therein,[14] as in the case of statutes making it an offense to compel or coerce any employee to purchase goods or supplies from any particular person, firm, company, or corporation,[15] or prohibiting employers from attempting to prevent any employee from voluntarily furnishing information concerning an accident to an employee of a common carrier.[16]

Under some statutes, except as otherwise provided by law, no person, as a condition of securing employment or of continuing employment, may be required to be fingerprinted.[17] It has been held that the exception in the provision includes not only state statutes, but also local laws, municipal ordinances and regulations, and rules promulgated within the authority granted to officials.[18]

Under statutory provisions requiring the cash payment of wages, an employee is not entitled to recover money paid on account of stock subscriptions induced by the employer's threat to discharge the employee if he did not subscribe and by implication that if the employee subscribed he would be permitted to continue employment indefinitely, where the contract, although made at the instance of the employer, was not with the employer and the sellers of the stock were not joined in the action as parties defendant.[19] Moreover, recovery may not be had against the employer on the theory of duress and fraud in the absence of a showing of damage.[20]

Political affiliations and activities. Under some statutes an employer may not forbid or prevent employees from engaging or participating in politics or from becoming candidates for public office, or control or direct the political activities or affiliations of employees.[21] The test of "political activities or affiliations" within such a statute is not membership in, or activities connected with, any particular group or organization, but whether such activities are related to, or connected with, the orderly conduct of government and the peaceful organization, regulation, and administration of government,[22] and the statute does not protect any individual or group advocating the overthrow of government by force or violence.[23]

C. EMPLOYEE ORGANIZATIONS; DISCRIMINATORY PRACTICES; DETERMINATION OF DISPUTES

1. In General

§ 28(1). In General

The public policy is to secure the peaceful settlement of controversies between employer and employees.

The peaceful settlement of controversies between employer and employees is generally a matter of public concern,[24] and the public policy is to foster industrial peace by encouraging collective bargaining between employer and employees and by securing the settlement of labor disputes by conciliation, mediation, and arbitration.[25]

§ 28(2). Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

a. In general
b. National Labor Relations Act
c. Railway Labor Act
d. State constitutional and statutory provisions

a. In General

Numerous legislative enactments have dealt with the relations of employer and employee and have sought to forestall and adjust differences between them.

Numerous legislative enactments have dealt with the relations of employer and employees and have sought to forestall and adjust differences between them by the encouragement of collective bargaining, and the settlement of labor disputes through conciliation, mediation, and arbitration.[26] Such statutes govern the rights and duties of employers and employees subject to their provisions.[27]

b. National Labor Relations Act

The National Labor Relations Act generally provides

20. N.Y.—Caesar v. H. S. Chardavoyne, Inc., supra.

21. Cal.—Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 171 P.2d 21, 28 Cal.2d 481.

Statutes held valid

U.S.—Santiago v. People of Puerto Rico, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 154 F.2d 811.

Cal.—Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 171 P.2d 21, 28 Cal.2d 481.

Damages

Where laborer was allegedly discharged because of refusal to vote for certain candidate, but had never been employed for definite time, corporate employer and manager were held not liable in damages, notwithstanding statute subjecting an officer or agent of corporation to imprisonment on conviction of coercing or intimidating employee to vote for any candidate.—Bell v. Faulkner, Mo. App., 75 S.W.2d 612.

Discharge

(1) The act of an employer in discharging day laborer on plantation or in refusing to give him further employment because of his political affiliation is an act of "prejudicial discrimination" within statute prohibiting such discrimination against employees.—Santiago v. People of Puerto Rico, C.C.A.Puerto Rico, 154 F.2d 811.

(2) In prosecution for violation of statute, evidence justified finding that workman was discharged because of affiliation with a certain political party and that defendant, who was overseer of plantation, was an "employer" within the act.—Santiago v. People of Puerto Rico, supra.

22. Cal.—Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 171 P.2d 21, 28 Cal.2d 481.

Words "politics" and "political" in statute imply orderly conduct of government and not revolution.—Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, supra.

24. U.S.—Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, Va., 57 S. Ct. 592, 300 U.S. 515, 81 L.Ed. 789.

Threats, force, or intimidation

Neither employer nor employee may use threats, force, or intimidation in bringing their side of wage controversy before public, or urge or advertise it by false statements, insulting language, or other means calculated to become nuisance, obstruct traffic, or impede orderly course of business or other relations. —Paramount Enterprises v. Mitchell, 140 So. 328, 104 Fla. 407.

for the regulation of practices occurring in relations between employer and employees which provoke or tend to provoke labor disturbances affecting interstate commerce.

The National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, generally provides for the regulation of practices occurring in relations between employer and employees which provoke or tend to provoke strikes or labor disturbances affecting interstate commerce,[28] and establishes a single tribunal, the National Labor Relations Board, to administer the provisions of the statute, with adequate and exclusive opportunity for judicial review in a designated court.[29] The basic purpose of the statute is to protect interstate commerce from the adverse effects of labor disputes and to prevent obstructions to the free flow of such commerce arising from industrial unrest.[30] The intent is to forestall possible labor strife with its harmful repercussions on the employer, employee, and the general public,[31] and to promote the peaceful settlement of disputes between employers and employees,[32] by securing to employees the right to organize, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for that and other purposes,[33] free of domination or influence by the employer or others.[34] The statute is not calculated to force adjustments of disputes, and each party to a labor controversy is left to use its own economic strength in all lawful ways to promote its advantage.[35] However, a necessary hostility between employers and employees is not contemplated.[36]

It has been held that the purpose of the statute is to protect the rights of employees generally,[37] but under the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, which amended the National Labor Relations Act, the declared purpose is also to protect the legitimate rights of employers with relation to employees. The intention of the National Labor Relations Act is to accord employees full freedom to belong or not to belong to a labor union,[38] but it does not compel an employer to hire members of one union rather than another union, or union men rather than nonunion men.[39] The statute does not guarantee to employees the right to do as they please[40] or grant a blanket immunity to employees from the consequences of illegal acts and breaches of contract just because they were committed in the course of a labor dispute, no matter how helpful they might be to their cause.[41]

Right to direct

Employer has the right to direct employee as to tasks to be performed and manner of performance.—N. L. R. B. v. Scullin Steel Co., C.C.A.8, 161 F.2d 143.

41. N.Y.—Barfield v. Standard Oil

The statute is essentially remedial[42] and contemplates no more than the protection of the public rights which it creates and defines.[43]

No enforceable private right is created until a matter has been brought before the National Labor Relations Board, it has entered and sought to enforce its order, and judgment enforcing the order has been entered.[44] The act confers no right of action triable by a jury or otherwise,[45] and employees can invoke the act only to bring about collective bargaining and the settlement of disputes by electing bargaining representatives under the supervision of the board if those who represent them are in doubt, and by proceeding before the board to procure the restraint of interference with their rights to bargain, the restraint of other unfair and discriminatory labor practices, and the reinstatement of employees who have been subjected to any unfair labor practice.[46]

The National Labor Relations Act does not carry a penal program declaring described unfair labor practices to be crimes, and does not prescribe penalties or fines in vindication of public rights or provide indemnity against community losses as distinguished from the protection and compensation of employees.[47] The sanctions of the act are imposed not in punishment of the employer but for the protection of the employee.[48]

c. Railway Labor Act

The Railway Labor Act was enacted to promote the orderly and peaceful settlement of labor disputes affecting interstate railroads.

By Transportation Act 1920 title III chapter 91, 41 U.S.St. at L. pages 456, 469, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 131–146, congress established the Railroad Labor Board as a means for the peaceful settlement by agreement, or by arbitration of labor controversies between interstate railroad carriers and their employees.[49] Such statute sought to encourage settlements without strikes, first by conference between the parties, failing that, by reference to adjustment boards of the parties' own choosing and, if this was ineffective, by a full hearing before a national board; but the disputants were not in any way forced into compliance with the statute or with the judgments of the board.[50] In 1926 congress, aware of the impotence of the board, and of the fact that its authority was generally not recognized or respected by the railroads or their employees, repealed the 1920 Act and adopted the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.[51] By the new measure congress continued its policy of encouraging the amicable adjustment of labor disputes by their voluntary submission to arbitration before an impartial board, and it supported that policy by the imposition of legal obligations and provision of means for enforcing the award obtained by arbitration between the parties.[52] By the Railway Labor Act of 1934 various other obligations were imposed on carriers with respect to noninterference with employees' organizations,[53] and the Railroad Adjustment Board was created for the adjudication of grievances, and to get them out of the way of settling major disputes through the Mediation Board.[54]

The primary purpose of the Railway Labor Act as amended, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., is to avoid the interruption of interstate commerce by promoting the orderly and peaceful settlement of labor disputes affecting railroads.[55] In order to effectuate

this purpose, the statute safeguards the rights of employees to self-organization and to bargain collectively with the carrier through representatives of their own choosing without interference by the carrier[56] and encourages the use of the nonjudicial processes of negotiation, mediation, and arbitration.[57] The statute does not undertake governmental regulation of wages, hours, or working conditions, but seeks merely to provide a means by which agreement may be reached with respect thereto.[58] The statute is not self-executing but merely provides the machinery by which described labor practices may, after due hearing, be held to be unfair and the person against whom complaint is made ordered to cease and desist from such practices.[59] The statute does not manifest an intention to exclude a state from exercising the right to approve or disapprove the terms on which one carrier may use another carrier's property or facilities.[60]

d. State Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Various state statutes provide methods for the peaceful settlement of labor disputes.

The legislatures of various states have recognized a public interest in the relation between employer and employees,[61] and various statutes have been enacted providing new methods of peacefully settling labor disputes in order to safeguard the interests of the public, employers, and employees.[62] Some statutes, similar in purpose to the National Labor Relations Act,[63] provide for protection of the right of employees to self-organization and to bargain collectively with employers,[64] and other statutes provide for mediation or arbitration of labor dis-

The substitution of "may" for "shall" in the Railway Labor Act, as amended, does not indicate a change in policy but is a clarification of the original purpose to establish and maintain a system for peaceful adjustment and mediation voluntary in its nature.—Moore v. Duty

The 1934 amendment to the Railway Labor Act which superseded the act of 1926 continued and placed the duty on carriers and employees to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain agreements concerning rates of pay, rules and working conditions and to settle disputes.—Brisbin v. putes under the guidance and supervision of a governmental agency.[65] The purpose of these statutes is generally to promote industrial peace and to prevent strikes in order that there may be no obstructions to the free flow of industry and trade.[66]

Statutes promoting industrial peace by the encouragement of collective bargaining do not destroy, nor are they calculated to invade, contract rights, but they do seek to protect the public against unfair labor practices and to foster the continuance of that relation in which the public is interested.[67] They make no effort to destroy free competition;[68] they merely attempt to insure equality of bargaining power on which the benefits of free competition and enterprise rest, and thus secure to the individual workman a larger measure of freedom in his dealings with employers.[69] The purpose is to safeguard the right of workmen to self-organization[70] and to encourage and protect the practice of collective bargaining through representatives of the workers' own choosing;[71] and accordingly such statutes are intended to keep employer and employee organizations separate and distinct, free from domination by the other.[72]

The fundamental policy is to preserve the public interest rather than to punish a guilty employer,[73] or merely to confer benefits on those covered by the statute.[74] The statutes are essentially remedial[75] and are not criminal in their nature.[76] Usually they do not prescribe penalties or fines in vindication of public rights, or provide indemnity against community losses, as distinguished from protection and compensation of employees.[77] The rights created by constitutional and statutory provisions relating to labor practices exist independently of the machinery set up by statute for their enforcement.[78]

It has been held that a statute protecting the right of self-organization and collective bargaining is simply declaratory of the preëxisting law and does not render lawful any act which was unlawful when the statute was enacted.[79] Statutes regulating picketing are aimed at conduct involving assaults by pickets acting in concert, the payment by labor unions of fines imposed on pickets, and the forcible prevention of ingress to, and egress from, the employer's premises.[80]

b. State constitutional and statutory provisions

a. Federal Statutes

Congress may regulate labor relations in employments affecting interstate commerce.

As a general rule, congress may regulate labor relations in employments affecting interstate commerce.[81] Discrimination and coercion to prevent the free exercise of the right of employees to self-organization and representation for collective bargaining purposes are proper subjects of condemnation by competent legislative authority,[82] and in the enactment of legislation covering such subjects congress is entitled to determine what remedy it will provide, the way that remedy shall be sought, the extent to which it shall be afforded, and the means by which it shall be made effective.[83]

Numerous decisions have sustained the validity of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and particular provisions thereof,[84] at least to the extent that it limits its regulation of la-

Particular provisions held valid

(2) Establishing employees' right to self-organization and to bargain collectively.—N. L. R. B. v. Tidewater Express Lines, C.C.A.4, 90 F.2d 301—S. Buchsbaum & Co. v. Beman, D.C.Ill., 14 F.Supp. 444.

(3) Prohibiting an employer from discouraging employees from becoming members of labor unions by discrimination with regard to hire, tenure, or condition of employment.

U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Associated Press, C.C.A.2, 85 F.2d 56, affirmed Associated Press v. N. L. R. B., 57 S. Ct. 650, 301 U.S. 103, 81 L.Ed. 953.

D.C.—Press Co. v. N. L. R. B., 118 F.2d 937, 73 App.D.C. 103, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1118, 313 U.S. 595, 85 L.Ed. 1548.

bor relations to subjects falling within the commerce power,[85] and the fact that the statute is claimed to be one-sided in its application and to subject the employer to supervision and restraint, and leave untouched abuses for which employees may be responsible, does not render it invalid as the legislative authority exerted within its proper field need not embrace all evils within its reach.[86] However, an earlier provision of National Industrial Recovery Act § 7 (a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 707 (a), assuring to employees the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing free from interference, restraint, or coercion from their employers was held invalid as applied to a company not directly engaged in interstate commerce.[87]

It has been held that a statute governing labor relations is the law of the land from the date of its enactment notwithstanding its validity is not sustained by the supreme court until a later date,[88] and that an employer attacking the validity of the statute must take proper steps to preserve the constitutional question and to have it heard before the court or body having jurisdiction to pass on it.[89]

Statutes governing interstate carriers. The power of congress over interstate commerce extends to such regulations of the relations of interstate carriers to their employees as are reasonably calculated to prevent the interruption of interstate commerce by strikes and their attendant disorders.[90] Accordingly numerous decisions have sustained the validity of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, providing for the orderly settlement of disputes between carriers and their employees,[91] and of the

where the applicant would have been employed had the employer not applied a forbidden criterion.—N. L. R. B. v. Waumbec Mills, C.C.A.1, 114 F. 2d 226.

(7) Authorizing service of process in proceedings by the board anywhere in the United States.—N. L. R. B. v. Hearst, C.C.A.9, 102 F.2d 658.

(8) Giving the board power to petition the circuit court of appeals for enforcement of its orders, and vesting in the court power to review the board's orders.—N. L. R. B. v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., C.C.A.9, 87 F.2d 611, affirmed 92 F.2d 761, reversed on other grounds 58 S.Ct. 904, 304 U.S. 333, 82 L.Ed. 1381.

(9) Authorizing the board to determine the appropriate bargaining unit. —Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 908, 313 U.S. 146, 85 L.Ed. 1251, rehearing denied 61 S. Ct. 1093, 313 U.S. 599, 85 L.Ed. 1551 —N. L. R. B. v. Botany Worsted Mills, C.C.A.3, 133 F.2d 876, certiorari denied Botany Worsted Mills v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 1164, two cases, 319 U.S. 751, 87 L.Ed. 1705.

Financial distress

The statute is valid even as applied to a carrier in financial distress.—Burke v. Morphy, C.C.A.Vt., 109 F.2d 572, certiorari denied Morphy v. Burke, 60 S.Ct. 1078, 310 U.S. 635, 84 L.Ed. 1404.

Particular provisions held valid

(1) Prohibiting company unions and imposing on railway the duty of treating with the authorized representative of its employees for the purpose of negotiating a labor dispute.—Texas Electric Ry. Co. v. Eastus, D.C.Tex., 25 F.Supp. 825, affirmed 60 S.Ct. 134, 308 U.S. 512, 84 L.Ed. 437, rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 258, 308 U.S. 637, 84 L.Ed. 529.

(2) Establishing majority rule in the selection of an employee bargaining agency.—National Federation of Railway Workers v. National Mediation Board, 110 F.2d 529, 71 App.D.C. 266, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 975, 310 U.S. 628, 84 L.Ed. 1399.

(3) Provision that award of adjustment board shall be final and binding on both labor organization and carrier.—Cook v. Des Moines Union Ry. Co., D.C.Iowa, 16 F.Supp. 810.

(4) Authorizing suit within a limited time for enforcement of an award of the board.—Washington Terminal Co. v. Boswell, 124 F.2d 235,

Federal Transportation Act of February 28, 1920, chapter 91, 41 U.S.St. at L. pages 456, 469, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 131, 146, which formerly governed the labor relations of railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce.[92] However, an earlier statute making it an offense for an interstate carrier to discharge an employee because of his membership in a labor organization was held invalid.[93]

b. State Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Generally a state may regulate the labor relations of its citizens, and state statutes are not ipso facto superseded by federal legislation applicable to the same situations.

As a general rule a state may regulate the labor relations of its citizens in the interests of peace, health, and order.[94] State statutes governing the relations of employer and employees, and providing a procedure for collective bargaining or for the arbitration and determination of differences have generally been held valid,[95] and a state constitutional provision prohibiting the denial or abridgment of the right to work because of membership or nonmembership in any labor union, but expressly preserving to employees the right to collective bargaining, has been held not in violation of the federal Constitution.[96] However, some statutes regulating labor relations have been held invalid,[97] as in the 76 U.S.App.D.C. 1, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 1430, 319 U.S. 732, 87 L.Ed. 1694.

(5) Authorizing taxing of attorney's fees in case of successful suit in district court to enforce an award of National Railroad Adjustment Board.—Cook v. Des Moines Union Ry. Co., D.C.Iowa, 16 F.Supp. 810.

Award not otherwise enforceable

Facts that under Railway Labor Act award of National Railway Adjustment Board is not self-enforcing or enforceable by board but employee is authorized to institute suit within two years from accrual of causes of action under award for enforcement thereof, and carrier is not given right to institute suit for review of award, do not render the act invalid.—Washington Terminal Co. v. Boswell, 124 F.2d 235, 76 U.S.App. D.C. 1, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 1430, 319 U.S. 732, 87 L.Ed. 1694.

Particular provisions held valid

(1) Authorizing the state labor relations board to fix a unit for collective bargaining.—Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. New York State Labor Relations Board, 6 N.Y.S.2d 775, 168 Misc. 948, affirmed 7 N.Y.S.2d 1007, 255 App.Div. 840 and 7 N.Y.S.2d 1008, 255 App.Div. 840, affirmed 20 N.E.2d 390, 280 N.Y. 194.

(2) Providing that fact findings of board shall be conclusive.—The Nevins v. Boland, 3 N.Y.S.2d 323, 167 Misc. 428.

(3) Declaring it to be an unfair labor practice for an employee, individually or in concert with others, to coöperate in engaging in picketing or any other overt concomitant of a strike unless a majority in a collective bargaining unit of employees of employer against whom such acts are directed have voted to call a strike.—Hotel and Restaurant Employees' International Alliance, Local No. 122 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 294 N.W. 632, 236 Wis. 329, rehearing denied 295 N.W. 634, 236 Wis. 329, affirmed 62 S.Ct. 706, 315 U.S. 437, 86 L.Ed. 946.

(4) Authorizing the board of conciliation and arbitration to investigate the cause of any strike or lockout where more than a certain number of persons are employed, and to make and publish a report assigning responsibility.—Moore Drop Forging Co. v. Fisher, 132 N.E. 169, 239 Mass. 434.

(5) Permitting labor unions to endeavor to induce an employer, when unionizing his shop, to agree to refrain from working in his business with his own hands.—Senn v. Tile Layers Protective Union, Local No. 5, Wis., 57 S.Ct. 857, 301 U.S. 468, 81 L.Ed. 1229.

Exclusion of certain organizations

Statute concerning labor and labor organizations is not invalid for capricious discrimination in expressly excluding organizations within influence of Federal Railway Labor Act, by which congress intended, in large part, if not entirely, to preempt field covered by salient features of such act.—Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 18 So.2d 810, 246 Ala. 1, certiorari granted 65 S.Ct. 191, 323 U.S. 703, 89 L.Ed. 567, certiorari dismissed 65 S.Ct. 1384, 325 U.S. 450, 89 L.Ed. 1725.

96. U.S.—American Federation of Labor v. Watson, D.C.Fla., 60 F.Supp. 1010, reversed on other grounds 66 S.Ct. 761, 327 U.S. 582, 90 L.Ed. 873.

Benefit without burden

Fact that such constitutional provision makes it possible for nonunion members to benefit from union activities without bearing any of the burdens of such activities does not render it invalid.—American Federation of Labor v. Watson, supra.

Particular provisions held invalid

(1) Making it an offense for an employer to require or influence any person to agree not to join or remain in a labor union as a condition of obtaining or retaining employment.—Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, W.Va., 38 S.Ct. 65, 245 U.S. 229, 62 L.Ed. 260, L.R.A.1918C, 497, Ann.Cas.1918B, 461, mandate stayed 38 S.Ct. 190—Coppage v. State of Kansas, Kan., 35 S.Ct. 240, 236 U.S. 1, 59 L.Ed. 441, L.R.A.1915C, 960—Montgomery v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., C.C.A.Cal., 293 F. 680, certiorari denied, 1924, 44 S.Ct. 334, 264 U.S. 586, 68 L.Ed. 862—Goldfield Consol. Mines Co. v. Goldfield Miner's Union No. 20, C.C.Nev., 159 F. 500—39 C.J. p 68 note 16—63 C.J. p 659 note 56.

(2) Prohibiting participation in any strike, walkout or cessation of work not authorized by majority vote of employees, and prohibiting caus-

case of statutes, declaring it unlawful for an employee to refuse to use or work on any particular materials, equipment, or supplies because they are not produced, processed, or delivered by members of labor organizations,[98] or statutes providing for a system of compulsory arbitration of industrial disputes in certain businesses declared to be affected with a public interest, as applied to businesses not in fact clothed with a public interest.[99]

Effect of federal legislation. It has been held that federal enactments governing labor relations, such as the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S. C.A. § 151 et seq, are intended only to regulate and protect interstate commerce, and that the field of proper state action with respect to labor relations generally is intended to be left unrestricted as far as possible.[1] Accordingly such federal legislation does not ipso facto preclude state legislation applicable to the same situations,[2] and the states are not deprived of their police power to protect property rights or punish illegal acts committed in the course of labor disputes.[3] The National Labor Relations Act does not supersede state statutes as to labor relations which do not so affect interstate commerce as to bring them within the commerce clause of the federal Constitution,[4] nor does it supersede state statutes effective as an exercise of police power even in labor relations involving interstate commerce;[5] but in case of conflict in administration of the state and national labor relations acts, in matters properly within the scope of the national act, the state must yield.[6] Accordingly, since jurisdiction to determine appropriate bargaining units and to certify collective bargaining representatives is vested exclusively in the National Labor Relations Board where an industry is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the national act, state action in this field is foreclosed,[7] and a state labor relations board may not constitutionally entertain a petition for the determination of such matters where the employer is engaged in interstate commerce notwithstanding the National Labor Relations Board has not acted in the same case.[8]

§ 28(4). —— Construction, Amendment, and Repeal

ing cessation of work or interfering with progress of work by reason of jurisdictional dispute.—Stapleton v. Mitchell, D.C.Kan., 60 F.Supp. 512, appeal dismissed Mitchell v. McElroy, 66 S.Ct. 172, 326 U.S. 690, 90 L.Ed. 406, and McElroy v. Mitchell, 66 S.Ct. 172, 326 U.S. 690, 90 L.Ed. 406.

No conflict
It was held, however, prior to the decision of the matter by the supreme court of the United States, that where the National Labor Relations Board had not taken jurisdiction of a labor controversy no conflict existed between a state labor relations statute applied to the controversy and rights guaranteed employees by the National Labor Relations Act.—Public Service Emp. Union v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Bd., 16 N.W.2d 823, 246 Wis. 190.

Legislative enactments dealing with relations between employer and employees and encouraging the peaceful settlement of labor disputes by collective bargaining are remedial in nature and should be liberally construed; and this rule has been applied in the construction of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq,[9] the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq,[10] and state statutes of a similar nature.[11] Such statutes are to be construed to effectuate their purpose of preventing industrial strife[12] and to harmonize the procedure with the characteristics of our system of government wherein the law is supreme.[13] They are not to be administered for the purpose of vengeance but for the ends of justice to give tranquillity to industrial life.[14]

A statute providing for notification of state officers of a labor controversy and for mediation of such dispute has been held mandatory and not directory.[15]

Prospective or retroactive operation. As a rule the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes are prospective in operation and do not apply to transactions occurring prior to their enactment[16] or to employment relations previously terminated.[17] However, a labor dispute which is current at the time of enactment of the statute is subject to its operation notwithstanding the dispute originated prior to passage of the statute.[18]

Amendment and repeal. General rules as to amendment and repeal of statutes apply in the case of amendment or repeal of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes dealing with labor relations.[19] The Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, 29 U.S.C.A. §§ 141–197, generally amends the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. It has been held that employers who operate in interstate transportation by motor carrier are compelled to obey the mandates of the Motor Carrier Act equally with the mandates of the National Labor Relations Act, and that the safety provisions of the Motor Carrier Act are of paramount importance.[20] It has also been held that the maritime safety laws are paramount to the National Labor Relations Act to the extent that any proposed order of the Labor Relations Board may increase danger.[21]

In light of constitutional provision

The statute should be construed in the light of constitutional provision as to the right of employees to collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing.—Trustees of Columbia University in City of New York v. Herzog, 46 N.Y.S. 2d 130, 181 Misc. 903, reversed on other grounds 53 N.Y.S.2d 617, 269 App.Div. 24, affirmed 64 N.E.2d 351, 295 N.Y. 605.

Social purposes

The court must construe the labor law and its collective bargaining provisions not narrowly, but so as to give life to the social purposes of the act to avoid labor strife and promote labor peace.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Nature of amendment

The rider to National Labor Relations Board Appropriation Act prohibiting use of funds in a "complaint case" arising over agreement between management and labor which has been in existence for at least three months without complaint being filed was not intended as a substantive amendment to the National Labor Relations Act.—N. The Selective Service Act would not be regarded as amending or repealing any part of the National Labor Relations Act in absence of specific repeal or positive repugnancy, and effect would be given both by reasonable construction.—Droste v. Nash-Kelvinator Corp., D.C.Mich., 64 F.Supp. 716.

§ 28(5). Employments Included within Regulatory Provisions

In the absence of a provision to the contrary, statutes regulating relations between employers and employees apply to all employments regardless of the nature or character of the particular business or activity.

In the absence of a provision to the contrary, statutes regulating relations between employers and employees apply to all employments regardless of the nature or character of the particular business or activity,[22] and they are not limited in their application to employment relations in industry.[23] Some statutes, however, are limited in their application to industrial pursuits,[24] or to businesses or employments "affected with a public interest,"[25] such as "public utilities."[26]

The word "industry" within statutory provisions controlling labor relations in industry covers labor conditions in any field of employment where the objective is the earning of a livelihood on one side and the gaining of a profit on the other.[27] In the absence of express exemption, statutes have been held to apply to banks,[28] insurance companies,[29] and retail businesses.[30]

Railway Labor Act. The Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, applies only to carriers of the kind specified in the statute,[31] and has been held not to govern the labor relations of corporations engaged in motor freight trucking service and motor transit bus service in interstate commerce.[32] The statute exempts from its operation interurban electric railways[33] except where they operate as part of a general steam railroad system of transportation.[34]

"Seasonal industries," exempted from operation of statute prohibiting strikes without thirty days' written notice by provision that statute shall not apply to seasonal industries, includes every class of industry made seasonal by natural causes, but not industries which are seasonal by reason of fluctuations in consumer demand.—Local Union, Division No. 1362, Amalgamated Ass'n of Street Elec. § 28(6). —— Charitable, Educational, and Nonprofit Enterprises

Some statutes dealing with labor relations have been held to apply to nonprofit organizations as well as to profit-making enterprises, but other statutes have been construed as not applying to charitable corporations.

Some statutes dealing with labor relations have been held to apply to nonprofit organizations as well as to profit-making enterprises,[36] and hence to govern the labor relations of charitable corporations operated as public hospitals, at least with respect to nonprofessional and maintenance employees.[37] This was the rule under the National Labor Relations Act prior to the amendment specifically excepting hospitals from operation of the statute.[38] It has also been held, in the absence of express provisions to the contrary, that other statutes are limited to industrial pursuits and do not include as an employer a charitable or eleemosynary association.[39] In this respect it has been held that the fact that hospitals organized and conducted as charitable institutions are not expressly excepted from the definition of "employer" in the statute is not conclusive that they are within such term,[40] and such institutions will not be considered employers where they do not come within the scope of the statute in the light of its declared underlying and predominant aim and object,[41] and may be regarded as impressed with a public interest taking them out of the purview of the statute.[42]

Some statutes expressly exempt from their operation charitable, educational, and religious associations or corporations.[43] Under such provisions the test of the applicability of the statute is not the nature of the undertaking on which the employee is engaged but the character of the employer,[44] and the exemption may be applicable although the particular activity does not involve charitable or educational work.[45] It has also been held that the exemption is not limited to educational corporations which are nonprofit corporations, but includes educational corporations operated as commercial enterprises for profit.[46] However, private hospitals operated for profit have been held to be employers within the statute,[47] not impliedly exempted by provisions relating to charitable associations, corporations, or enterprises.[48]

§ 28(7). —— Public Employment

Statutes dealing with labor relations generally do not apply to the United States, or to any state or political subdivision thereof, in their capacity as employers.

The National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, does not recognize the existence of the right of collective bargaining in public employment and expressly excepts from the definition of the term "employer" the United States and any state or political subdivision thereof.[49] Some state statutes dealing with labor relations similarly except from their operation the state and its agencies,[50] and it has been held that the same rule applies even in the absence of express provision[51] on the ground that the statute would not be construed so as largely to nullify the elaborate system of laws constituting the policy of the state in the domain of public employment.[52] Accordingly the state and its municipalities need not contract for terms and conditions of public employment even in respect of matters not covered by state law or county and city charters or ordinances,[53] or in respect of activities conducted in a proprietary capacity as distinguished from a governmental capacity.[54] However, a statute providing for mediation of labor disputes involving a public utility or industry affected with a public interest has been held to apply to a municipality operating a power plant.[55]

A statutory provision exempting employees of the state or its agencies does not give immunity to employees in their capacity as employers of helpers.[56] One engaged in the interstate transportation of mail by truck pursuant to a contract with the United States is an independent contractor, and an employer within the statute, and his employees are not employees of the United States.[57]

§ 28(8). —— Labor and Employer Organizations

Labor and employer organizations acting as employers or in their interest are subject to the operation of statutes dealing with labor relations.

A union which is not engaging in a legitimate function as a labor union to secure the interests of workmen by agreement with respect to wages, hours, or conditions of employment is not entitled to immunity from classification as an employer under statutes dealing with labor relations,[58] and this is particularly the case where the membership of the union consists not of employees and workers but of business men and entrepreneurs.[59]

Employer organizations. An association of employers which acts in concert with its members in the perpetration of alleged unfair labor practices may be considered an employer within the terms of the statute.[60] The term "employer organization" as used in a statute declaring contrary to public pol-

Building maintenance employees

Elevator operators, watchmen, and janitors employed in a building owned by corporation and housing tenants engaged in interstate commerce are so closely associated with the flow of interstate commerce as to be entitled to protection under the statute regardless of whether they were employed by owner or by a building maintenance company doing work for the owner.—Butler Bros. v. and only in such case.[65]

In determining whether the operations of an employer are subject to the statute, it is the effect on interstate commerce and not the source of the injury which is the criterion.[66] The test is not whether operations of the employer constitute interstate commerce, but whether a stoppage of operations by threatened industrial strife would result in a substantial interruption to, or interference with, the free flow of such commerce.[67] The per cent of the interstate transactions to the entire business of a company is not of itself determinative of whether the company's business affects interstate commerce,[68] and an employer may be within the statute even though only a small per cent of the entire business is interstate in character.[69] So the fact that an employer engages in activities other than interstate business does not withdraw it from amenability to the labor relations statute where such activities do not subordinate the interstate business to insignificance.[70] The statute may apply even though the employer is not himself engaged in commerce,[71] or is engaged mainly in intra-state commerce,[72] if its

Plants engaged in intra-state commerce only

(1) A company purchasing most of its materials and supplies in other states than that wherein two of its three plants were located, making large interplant shipments of materials and supplies, and selling and delivering a substantial part of its products to customers outside the state in which produced is within the statute although the industrial dispute which gave rise to the charges against it occurred at the plant producing goods sold only in the state wherein it was located.—N. L. R. B. v. Schmidt Baking Co., C.C.A., 122 F.2d 162.

(2) It has been held, however, that where a company maintained two plants and made no interstate shipments from one plant, orders of the National Labor Relations Board to cease and desist certain violations of the statute would not be enforced as respects such plant.—N. L. R. B. v. Santa Cruz Fruit Packing Co., C.C.A., 91 F.2d 790, affirmed 58 S.Ct. 656, 303 U.S. 453, 82 L.Ed. 954.

In determining whether an employer is within the statute, the magnitude of its business[73] or the volume of interstate commerce affected[74] ordinarily is not material, except in so far as the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, applies.[75] Thus an employer may be within the statute although the quantity of products he ships in interstate commerce is small in proportion to the total interstate commerce in that product from all the states or from the manufacturer's state,[76] or although its business constitutes a relatively small per cent of the trade or industry in which it is engaged,[77] and it is not a bar to application of the statute that customers might be able to secure the same services or goods from other companies in the same state if a labor dispute should stop the operation of the business.[78] Also the fact that the labor dispute actually did not interfere with interstate commerce, and that even if continued the interstate business could otherwise be handled, may not be relied on to prevent application of the statute.[79] The statute applies to forestall labor troubles which may affect commerce, not merely to stop or remedy those which have occurred.[80]

The nature and extent of an employer's activities determine whether they affect interstate commerce so as to bring the business within the operation of the National Labor Relations Act.[81] Whether the

Plants not running at capacity

The facts that a certain plant of a packing company in which there was a labor dispute was located in a city in which there were several similar plants which were not running at full capacity and that if the company's plant closed down all the interstate commerce done by it would readily be done by the other plants in the city did not establish that interstate commerce was not affected by the labor dispute so as to defeat the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. Total incidence of activities

Whether employer's labor practices might be deemed by congress to affect interstate commerce was not to be determined by confining judgment to the quantitative effect of activities immediately before the National Labor Relations Board, but conduct of an intra-state business affects interstate or foreign commerce so closely as to be subject to federal control under the National Labor Relations Act is left to be determined as individual cases arise.[82] Regard must be had to all the existing facts and circumstances,[83] including the bearing and effect of any protective action already taken under state authority;[84] and the justification for the exercise of federal power should clearly appear.[85] It may be sufficient to bring an employer within the statute, either by itself, or together with other facts and circumstances warranting the conclusion that the employer's activities affect interstate commerce, that the employer ships products or goods in interstate commerce,[86] purchases all or a substantial part of its raw materials or stocks of fact that the immediate situation was representative of many others throughout the country, the total incidence of which if left unchecked might well become far-reaching in its harm to commerce, could be considered.—Polish Nat. Absence of state proceedings

The National Labor Relations Board had jurisdiction of labor disputes of parent utility and its subsidiaries operating an integrated system engaged in intra-state business, but affecting interstate and foreign commerce, as against contention that state legislature had enacted comprehensive and adequate measures to protect against interruption of service through labor disputes, where proceeding was instituted before the state statute became effective, and so far as appeared no proceedings had been taken under that statute in relation to unfair labor practices alleged.—Consolidated Edison Co. of N. Corporations which are intimately associated in a joint enterprise, as affiliated corporations, under the same management, engaged in an industrial operation involving a direct and continuous flow of commerce across state lines to the market are subject to the statute.[90] Where one company is jointly held with another company for unfair labor practices in which the latter was the prime movant, the former is subject to the statute regardless of whether it is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the statute.[91]

§ 28(10). Who Are Employers within Regulatory Provisions

The term "employer," as used in statutes dealing with labor relations, carries with it more than the technical and traditional common-law definition, and, generally, any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer is an employer within the statutes.

The term "employer," as used in statutes dealing with labor relations, carries with it more than the technical and traditional common-law definition; it also draws substance from the policy and purpose of the statute, the circumstances and background of the particular employment relationship, and all the hard facts of industrial life.[7] Accordingly, although the labor relations board in performing its function of defining and applying the term should not disregard the technical and traditional concept of "employer," it is not confined to such concept and may take into account the more relevant economic and statutory considerations.[8]

Statutes dealing with labor relations generally define the term "employer" as including any person acting directly or indirectly in the interest of an employer,[9] and by an amendment to the National

Electricity, gas, and steam

The National Labor Relations Board had jurisdiction of labor disputes of parent utility and its subsidiaries operating as an integrated system engaged in intra-state business furnishing electricity, gas, and steam where system imported large quantities of raw materials from without the state, and interruption of its public service would, because of interstate activities of its customers, halt operation of terminals and trains of three great interstate railroads, interstate communication by telegraph, telephone, and radio and lighting maintained to aid navigation, and would greatly impede business of interstate ferries and foreign steamships, notwithstanding only a small per cent of system's total business was used in interstate or foreign commerce.—Consolidated Edison Co. of N. An incorporated advisory board on labor relations could be considered an "employer," because acting on behalf of the employers.—In re New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 52 N.Y.S.2d 590, 183 Misc. 1064, affirmed 58 N.Y.S.2d 343, 269 App.Div. 934, appeal granted 59 N.Y.S.2d 292, 269 App.Div. 980, affirmed 66 N.E.2d 853, 295 N.Y. 839.

Labor Relations Act, § 2 (2), 29 U.S.C.A. § 152 (2), the term is defined as including any person acting as an agent of an employer. One who aids the immediate employer in contravening the statute is also an employer under the common-law principle that an agent is accountable for his illegal acts, even though performed under conditions imposing liability on his principal.[10] Supervisory employees will be considered employers only where they act in the interest of the employer in matters envisaged by the statute, and not where they serve their own interest as employees with respect to wages, hours, seniority rights, or working conditions.[11]

Whoever as or in the capacity of the employer controls the employer-employee relations in an integrated industry is an employer,[12] and, where in fact there is but one enterprise, that enterprise, as a whole, is responsible for compliance with the statute regardless of the corporate arrangements of the parties among themselves.[13] So a parent corporation may be responsible for its activities with respect to the employees of a wholly owned subsidiary,[14] to the extent that it controls the labor relations of such subsidiary.[15] On the other hand, a parent corporation is not responsible for unfair labor practices committed by a subsidiary where it did not exercise control over the labor practices of its subsidiary and did not participate in the acts of which complaint is made.[16]

Generally, no formal change in the corporate structure of an employer, as by merger, will be permitted to vitiate its relations with its employees, or lessen its obligations under the statute,[17] but it has been held that, where a substantial new corporation is organized, although with the same stockholders as the old corporation, each corporation is responsible for the acts of a supervisory employee only while employed by it, and the old corporation may not be charged as an employer with responsibility for the acts of the employee while employed by the new corporation.[18] A business employing persons is an employer within the terms of the statute, although it is in receivership,[19] or although it is being managed under an order in a reorganization proceeding.[20]

Independent contractor. In determining whether one contracting with another for the performance of certain services is an employer or whether the employees are those of an independent contractor, the contract should be appraised in connection with the circumstances.[21] The fact that one company used another in delivering its product, even if the latter were an independent contractor, would not protect the former from committing unfair labor practices if the purpose of such use was a forbid-

Terms not mutually exclusive

"Employer" and "employee," as defined in National Labor Relations Act, are not mutually exclusive since a foreman in his relation to his employer is an "employee" within the act and, in his relation to the laborers under him, he is the representative of the employer and is, therefore, an "employer" within the act.—N. L. R. B. v. Armour & Co., C.C.A.10, 154 F.2d 570, certiorari denied 67 S.Ct. 92.

Department heads and assistant department heads who, as practical matter, had power to bring about discharge of rank and file of employees, although actual discharge was handled by personnel director, were "supervisory officials" for purposes of National Labor Relations Act.—N. Publishing activities

An order of National Labor Relations Board, commanding newspaper publisher and numerous corporations, by means of which he conducted his publishing activities, to cease and desist from unfair labor practices, by coercing union employees, should be enforced, although only one of such corporations was nominal employer, since all of them acted directly or indirectly for such employer and, hence, were within definition of "employer," which is included in term "person" as used in statute.—N. den interference in labor matters.[22] Where an independent contractor knowingly participates in the effectuation of an unfair labor practice, it places itself within the orbit of the corrective jurisdiction of the statute.[23]

§ 28(11). Who Are Employees within Regulatory Provisions

Generally, the application of statutes dealing with labor relations depends on the existence of an employer and employee relationship, and the question whether persons are or are not employees is to be determined in accordance with the intent of the statute and the facts of the particular case.

As a general rule, the application of statutes dealing with labor relations depends on the existence of an employer and employee relationship.[24] The question whether persons are or are not employees is to be determined in accordance with the intent of the statute[25] and the facts of the particular case,[26] and, although the meaning of the term is the same wherever used in the statute,[27] it is not necessarily controlled by special definitions contained in other unrelated statutes.[28]

The term "employee," as used in the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes is not treated as a word of art having a definite meaning.[29] It is to be given a broad and comprehensive interpretation, taking color from its surroundings,[30] and is to be understood with respect to the purpose of the statute and the facts involved in the economic relationship,[31] rather than technically and exclusively by previously established

Separate definitions

Although the state labor relations act was inserted in consolidated laws, as an article of the chapter on labor law, the term "employees," as used in the act, was not confined to employees as defined by the earlier chapters of the labor law, in view of the fact that the act contained definition of the word "employees."—Metropolitan Life Ins. Effectiveness of collective bargaining

Employer-employee relationship within National Labor Relations Act may be found present where collective bargaining may appropriately be utilized as contemplated by the act.—N. L. R. B. v. E. C. Atkins Co., 67 S.Ct. 1265.

Remedial purpose

The statutory definition of the word "employee" should not be narrowed to make abortive the remedial purposes of the act.—Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 113 F. 2d 202, modified on other grounds Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 845, 313 U.S. 177, 85 L.Ed. 1271, 133 A.L.R. 1217.

legal classifications.[32] The term, as used in the statute, carries with it more than the traditional common-law definition,[33] and, while the common-law tests of the relationship of employer-employee are to be considered, they are not controlling.[34] Persons who are independent contractors are not employees within the statute.[35]

The term "employee," as used in the statutes, has been held not restricted to persons employed in industry,[36] or to manual laborers,[37] but extends to any employee,[38] including so-called white collar workers.[39] The term has been held to include bank employees,[40] insurance agents,[41] newsboys,[42] plant guards,[43] and service and maintenance employees of a private hospital,[44] or of a nonprofit charitable corporation operating a public hospital.[45]

Railway Labor Act. Every person in the service of a carrier is not an "employee" within the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, although subject to the carrier's continuing control and authority.[46] Under the statute, only those who perform work defined as that of an employee by existing or amended orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission are within its terms,[47] and the authority thus to define employees is not vested in the

Loyalty and efficiency

In determining status of plant guards as "employees," court could not assume that labor organizations would make demands on plant guards as members or extract concessions from employers so as to decrease guards' loyalty and efficiency. —N. Militarization

(1) If militarization of plant guards is qualified, so that employer retains power to fix wages, hours, and conditions of work, need and desirability for collective action of guards may exist, and recognition of statutory rights may be consistent with guards' military obligations, they remain "employees" under the statute; but, if militarization transfers to army matters which would form basis for collective bargaining, guards may lose such status.—N. courts.[48] Persons who are employees of independent contractors within the coverage and protection of the Social Security Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act are not employees of a railroad governed by special legislation enacted for railroad employees, such as the Railway Labor Act.[49]

§ 28(12). —— Persons Specifically Excepted from Operation of Statute

Statutes governing labor relations frequently exclude from the term "employee" certain persons not intended to be covered by the statute such as agricultural laborers, domestic servants, and persons employed by a parent or spouse.

The National Labor Relations Act § 2 (3), 29 U.S.C.A. § 152 (3), and similar statutes specifically exclude from the term "employee" certain persons not intended to be covered by the statute,[50] such as any individual employed as an agricultural laborer,[51] or in the domestic service of any family or person at his home,[52] or any individual employed by his parent or spouse.[53]

It has been held that the exemption of agricultural laborers is not measured by the magnitude of the farmer's planting or by the prolificacy of the harvest.[54] In determining whether a worker is an agricultural laborer within the exception, the nature of the work he does, modified by the custom of doing it, ordinarily is controlling,[55] but it has been held that the fact that the work is similar to that traditionally performed by agriculturists is not decisive where it is not performed as an incident to agricultural activity but as an incident to an industrial enterprise.[56] The work need not be strictly related to the crop in order to constitute agricultural labor within the statute, and, on the other hand, every work related strictly to the crop is not of necessity agricultural labor.[57] It has been held that the packing and preparing of agricultural products for the market are a necessary incident to any agricultural operation so that the labor necessary thereto is agricultural labor,[58] but it has also been held that employees who are not working at farming, but who are specializing in the preparation of farm products for trade or shipment after they have been reaped or gathered, are not agricultural laborers.[59] Employees of a packing plant which processes, packs, and sells the products of numerous individual producers are not agricultural laborers, although handling agricultural products.[60]

Labor Relations Act was subsequently amended to provide that the term "employee" shall not include any individual employed as a supervisor, it has been held that, in the absence of such express provision, the privileges and benefits of the statute conferred on employees extend to foremen[61] and other supervisory personnel.[62]

Employees of state or agency thereof. Some statutory provisions exclude from the term "employee" persons employed by the state or any subdivision or agency thereof,[63] but such exemption does not extend to employees of a business in liquidation being managed by the state superintendent of banks.[64] Helpers employed by custodians of school buildings are his employees subject to the statute and not employees of the board of education exempted from operation of the act.[65]

Employees of charitable organizations. Provisions specifically exempting from the act employees of a charitable association, corporation, or enterprise will not be construed as impliedly exempting employees of a private hospital.[66]

§ 28(13). —— Termination or Cessation of Employment

Generally, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, employees who quit their work to wage a lawful strike in a lawful manner continue as "employees" at least with respect to matters connected with the strike.

It has been held that the question whether the action of a workman in withdrawing from his job and participating in a strike which results in a stoppage of work terminates for such workman the relationship of employer and employee depends on the particular circumstances of each case,[67] and generally, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, employees who quit their work to wage a lawful strike in a lawful manner continue as "employees" at least with respect to matters connected with the strike.[68] Under the express provisions of the National Labor Relations Act § 2 (3), 29 U.S.C.A. § 152 (3), and similar statutes, an employee retains his status as such notwithstanding his employment has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute, or because of an unfair labor

Renunciation

If employees strike in connection with a current labor dispute, their action is not a renunciation of the employment relation and they remain "employees" for the remedial purposes specified in the National Labor Relations Act.—N. L. R. B. v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corporation, 59 S.Ct. 490, 306 U.S. 240, 83 L.Ed. 627, 123 A.L.R. 599.

Currency at time of hearing

Employees who went on strike and did not return to work were nevertheless "employees," although labor dispute which caused the strike was not current at time of hearing.—Eagle-Picher Mining & Smelting Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 119 F.2d 903.

One employed to begin work on the day strike began and who failed to report for work and joined picket line was an "employee."—Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 2, 113 F.2d 202, modified on other grounds Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. R. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 845, 313 U.S. 177, 85 L.Ed. 1271, 133 A.L.R. 1217.

Remedies

Where employees struck in consequence of labor disputes while the National Labor Relations Board was conducting an election, their remedies were unaffected by continuing on strike, and, when the employer refused to bargain with their certified bargaining agent, it violated the statute and became subject to such orders of the board as would effectuate the policies of the statute.—Black Diamond S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 875, certiorari denied 58 S.Ct. 1044, 304 U.S. 579, 82 L.Ed. 1542.

The word "regular," as used in provision of National Labor Relations Act, defining an employee as one whose work has ceased as a consequence of a labor dispute and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment, means substantially the same amount of work from point of time as employee had received from employer, and words "substantially equivalent" cover many things, including rate of pay, hours, working conditions, location of work, kind of work, and seniority rights, if any.—N. Guiltless employer

Strikers remain employees, and are protected against unfair labor practices, even though employer has not been guilty of any unfair labor practice, provided strike is in connection with a current labor dispute.—N. L. R. B. v. Lightner Pub. Corp. of Illinois, C.C.A.7, 113 F.2d 621.

Strike prior to passage of statute

Where striking employees were continuing their efforts to induce compliance with their demands, and employer, although work had been resumed, had not yet secured a full complement of workers at time alleged unfair labor practice took place, striking employees were then "employees" within meaning of National Labor Relations Act, notwithstanding strike had begun and work had been resumed prior to passage of act with warning to strikers to return to work if they desired to remain employees.—Standard Lime & mere quitting of work by an employee, in circumstances which do not definitely preclude further negotiations, does not necessarily terminate the relationship of employer and employee.[72]

The statutes, however, do not hold the employment relationship in statu quo in the absence of wrongful conduct on the part of the employer and of rightful conduct on the part of employees.[73] The employer-employee relationship may be terminated for proper cause,[74] such as unlawful conduct of the employee,[75] and it has been held that participants in a strike who engage in unlawful conduct toward the employer and nonstriking employees retain their status as employees only at the discretion of the employer.[76] The implied termination of an employer-employee relationship, by reason of unlawful conduct in labor controversies, applies only to those actually participating in the violence and their aiders and abettors.[77] Under some statutes, an employee who is guilty of an unfair labor practice may lose his status as an employee,[78] and the labor relations board has the authority to determine in a labor dispute whether the act of an employee is a complete and irrevocable termination of the employee status,[79] but the employer-employee relation is not to be dissolved because of differing ideas as to the right of collective bargaining or union membership.[80]

Where a sit-down strike developed into a general strike but the employer solicited all former employees to return to their jobs, the employer has been held to be precluded from claiming that the sit-down strikers have lost their status as employees.[81] Former employees who were discharged or who left their employment prior to the effective date of the statute are not "employees" within the statute.[82]

§ 28(14). Responsibility for Acts of Agents

Generally, an employer is responsible under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes for the actions and statements of supervisory employees and others who have actual or implied authority to represent him.

As a general rule, an employer is responsible under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes for the actions and

Violation of company rules

Employees who did not strike but continued to work without reporting in the morning as required by company rule and were discharged for violation of the rule ceased to be employees on date of discharge, and fact that such employees subsequently associated themselves with the strikers did not improve their position or gain the right to reinstatement as strikers.—Home Beneficial Life Ins. theory of agency or respondeat superior, but on the broader premise that the employer may be given an unlawful advantage by reason of unlawful conduct of subordinates in furtherance of the employer's known attitude or policy.[89] The controlling consideration is not the culpability of the employer, or the conventional representation of the master by an employee, but whether employees have been subjected to prohibited compulsions flowing from the employer's economic power, the use of which the employer could and should have prevented.[90] In other words, the prevailing test of the employer's reponsibility is not whether the supervisory employee's acts were authorized by the employer, but whether the employees subjected to the unlawful practices had reasonable cause to believe that the supervisors were acting for, and on behalf of, the management,[91] and it is generally held that acts of supervisory employees may bind the employer, even though they would not have this effect under the doctrine of respondeat superior.[92] So the employer has the duty, on learning of unlawful acts or statements of supervisory employees, to take steps to remove any effects of such action in order to avoid liability therefor.[93]

In determining whether it could reasonably be inferred that the conduct of supervisory employees represented the attitude of the employer so as to bind the latter, a number of factors may be considered, including the actual authority of the supervisory employees, their strategic position to translate to subordinates the management's policies and desires, the employee's previous union attitude, favoritism of the employer, and the employer's failure to renounce acts of supervisory officials and announce its impartiality.[94] However, all such factors need not be present in order to impose liability on the employer, and one or more may be sufficient to authorize the inference that the supervisory employee spoke for the employer.[95] When other evidence of the employee's agency for the employer is lacking, supervisory or disciplinary authority suffices,[96] but lack of such authority only makes it necessary to show the agency in other ways.[97]

Subjective test

Views expressed by employer's supervisors become important in determining whether employees have reasonable ground to believe that supervisors, in discouraging unionization or interfering in any way with their free choice of a bargaining agency, represent the views of the management; the test is not objective, but subjective, from standpoint of employees.—N. Acts considered in setting

Under National Labor Relations Act, acts of supervisory officials are not viewed in vacuo but are to be taken in their setting.—N. L. R. B. v. Brown Co., C.C.A.1, 160 F.2d 449.

Acts of coercion and intimidation by supervisory employees may be restrained and their resumption interdicted, even in absence of clear demonstration of prior authorization or subsequent ratification by the employer, at least where the circumstances are such as to induce in subordinate employees a reasonable apprehension that the acts condemned reflect the policy of the employer.—Consumers Power Co. v. The question is not one of legal liability of the employer in damages or for penalties on the principles of agency or respondeat superior, but only whether the statute condemns such activities as unfair labor practices as far as the employer may gain from them any advantage in the bargaining process of a kind which the statute proscribes.—H. 97. D.C.—International Ass'n of

If supervisory employees occupy positions of authority and may be reasonably regarded as representing the employer's policy, their acts and statements bind the employer, even though they are only minor supervisory officials,[98] not having the power to hire and discharge directly,[99] and notwithstanding they are eligible to union membership,[1] and are included in an appropriate unit for collective bargaining.[2] However, the mere fact that employees are characterized as "supervisory" does not of itself establish that they are vested with such apparent authority as to bind the employer by their acts,[3] at least where there is no proof of knowledge of their activities by the management or authorization thereof,[4] and there is no evidence of open or covert opposition or hostility on the part of the employer to employee self-organization or to a particular union or favoritism of another.[5]

When the unlawful activities of supervisory employees are sporadic and do not reflect the attitude of the employer otherwise indicated, the latter ordinarily will not be responsible for such activities.[6] Accordingly, isolated or casual expressions of minor supervisory employees, constituting nothing more than the utterance of individual views not authorized by the employer and not of such character or made under circumstances reasonably calculated to give rise to the conclusion that they are an expression of his policy, do not bind the employer.[7] However, the number of statements made by supervisory employees, their nature and substance, the time at which they were made, the con-

Inference of employer's liability for violation of act will not be drawn from a small number of isolated and unrelated incidents by minor officials, especially when they are susceptible of different constructions, and especially when considered in light of employer's fair attitude toward union.—N. Voters at election

Where assistant foremen who spent at least eighty per cent of their time in working and only the remainder in supervision and direction were permitted to vote without objection in election supervised by board, after the election employer could not be held responsible for what some of such voters said to each other on theory that their statements constituted unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Jas. H. Matthews & Co., C.C.A.3, 156 F.2d 706.

An anti-union petition circulated in employer's store during working hours shortly before election to determine whether a particular union should be collective bargaining representative of employees and signed only by persons who had been declared eligible to vote at election was not binding on employer so as to constitute an unfair labor practice in view of employer's established policy of allowing free expression by employees on labor matters.—N. L. R. B. v. J. L. Brandeis & Sons, C.C.A.8, 145 F.2d 556.

ditions under which they were made, and other circumstances in their totality may warrant the conclusion that they were more than mere casual or desultory expressions of individual views, unrelated to the policy of the employer.[8] Punitive action taken against employees by a supervisory official in pursuance of a purely personal grievance rather than as a labor practice of management does not bind the employer.[9]

Effect of employer's instructions to supervisory employees. An employer may not disclaim responsibility for acts of supervisory employees by express orders to them not to engage in unfair labor practices where they had definite indicia of authority to act for the employer,[10] or it appeared that the unlawful conduct had the employer's acquiescence, approval, or support,[11] especially where the employer did not communicate to other employees its instructions as to its policy, and the other employees were justified in believing that the supervisory employees were acting as the employer's representatives.[12] So, also, instructions not to engage in certain unlawful activities will not save the employer from responsibility for other unlawful activities by supervisory employees.[13] However, an isolated act in violation of express instructions is not to be imputed to the employer.[14]

Wages and working conditions

The "self-organization" which congress seeks to protect is the "self-organization of employees" in dealing with their employer with respect to wages and working conditions.—N. L. R. B. v. Sterling Electric Motors, C.C.A.9, 109 F.2d 194, reheard 112 F.2d 63, set aside on other grounds 114 F.2d 738, motion denied Ex parte N. L. R. When right protected

The protection of the right of employees to full freedom in self-organizational activities should be subordinated to the vindication of the interests of society as a whole in flagrant cases in which the misconduct of the employee is so violent or of such serious character as to render the employee unfit for further service, but not in cases in which accomplish and maintain such organization.[16] Also, some state constitutional provisions guarantee to employees the right to organize.[17] However, the right of workingmen to organize into unions to deal with employers is a fundamental one existing apart from such statutes,[18] and the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes did not create a new right to self-organization[19] or repeal any of the disabilities of the old right of employees to self-organization,[20] but merely broadened the old right by protecting it against certain practices which had become odious to an enlightened public, and which in labor terminology were unfair.[21] The right under statute to maintain labor organizations for collective bargaining is a·continuous one, and exists after the signing of a collective bargaining agreement as well as before.[22]

Generally, employees may join unions, even though they know of their employer's wish to the contrary.[23] Labor unions may be organized for the purpose of selling the labor of their members on stipulated terms,[24] securing better working conditions[25] and improved relations with employers,[26] fixing the hours of labor,[27] and arbitrating labor disputes.[28] They may be formed for the purpose of obtaining employment for their members,[29] or of securing control of the work connected with their trade[30] or favorable terms to their employers in the purchase of material, and contracts for such persons as employ members of their society.[31] They may be organized for the purpose of protecting and conserving their rights and interests[32] against possible aggression by the employer,[33] or of gaining collective bargaining power,[34] or of accumulating a fund reasonably necessary for the lawful conduct of a strike.[35]

Independent organizations of employees, if free of employer domination, are recognized by the statutes as proper agencies to represent employees and are entitled to recognition as such if they represent the free choice of a majority of the employees.[36] Employees are not compelled to affiliate themselves the employee exceeds the bounds of lawful conduct in a moment of exuberance.—N. L. R. B. v. Illinois Tool Works, C.C.A.7, 153 F.2d 811.

The effect of the pendency of a proceeding under the National Labor Relations Act to restrain employers from exerting pressure on employees to join certain union and from discouraging membership in another union would appropriately extend to the practices of the employers to which the complaint was addressed, but did not reach so far as to suspend the right of the employees to self-organization.—Consolidated Edison Co. of New York v. with existing national or other unions or associations.[37] The act protects self-organized unions as well as unions already existing and seeking to increase their membership,[38] and it protects the rights of independent unions as well as the rights of those nationally organized.[39] The right of employees to form an independent union and to be advised of that right is not dependent on the degree of coercion or persuasion which the employer may previously have exerted in the formation of such a union,[40] and, accordingly, the members of an employees' organization which is disestablished because the employer dominated or supported may form another organization, if free from domination, interference, or support of the employer.[41] However, the court will carefully scrutinize acts leading to the formation of an association which springs from, and has its inception in, a plan admittedly not in conformity with the statute, and will scrutinize any contribution made by the employer to the new association.[42]

As a general rule, the right of employees to self-organization is not to be controlled or influenced by any expression or form of order coming from the courts,[43] or from the labor relations board.[44] It is the duty of the board to protect the self-organization of employees where it is properly exercised;[45] and the board has no power to interfere with the action of a union membership in making a choice of their officers,[46] and directing their activities,[47] unless there is evidence of interference on the part of the employer in such matters.[48] However, a labor union, or other organization, in performing its functions as a bargaining agent of employees under the Railway Labor Act is not to be regarded as a wholly

Extent of benefit
The question whether greater benefit might have been secured to members of independent union had they selected national union as their bargaining agent was matter with which court could not be concerned, but was to be determined solely by the membership, and, if the agent selected was legally qualified and willing to serve, the court was bound to approve the selection.—Keystone Steel & Wire Co. v. private association of individuals free from all constitutional or statutory restraints to which public agencies are subjected,[49] and negro employees are not precluded from complaining about limitations placed on membership under the constitution and by-laws of a union.[50] It has been held that the tendency of the legislatures and the courts is to deal liberally with labor unions.[51]

Right to refuse to join labor organization. Under the statute employees have the right to refuse to join or create or assist any labor organization,[52] except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement with the employer requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment, as discussed infra § 28 (41) c.

"Labor organization" defined. Under some statutes, the term "labor organization" is defined as any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.[53] An organization may be considered a "labor organization" within the statute notwithstanding it has no charter, by-laws, or dues.[54]

§ 28(16). What Constitutes Labor Disputes

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the term "labor disputes" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating or fixing terms or conditions of employment.

Under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 152 (9), and similar statutes, the term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.[55] Ordinarily, a current la-

Labor organizations within statute

(2) Committees appointed by employer's superintendent for purpose of presenting petition for increase of wages for limited group of employees and for consideration with management of plan to improve working conditions were "labor organizations."—N. L. R. B. v. American Furnace Co., C.C.A.7, 158 F.2d 376.

(3) Where employer under "multiple management" plan had a "manufacturing" or "junior board" composed of factory employees, board had several committees including "the suggestions and grievance committee," "safety committee," and "personnel committee," board discussed rates of pay, hours of employment, etc., employer bore all expenses of board, conducted elections, and employer's board of directors approved all nominees and had power of removal, meetings and elections were held on employer's property, and employer's officers participated in meetings, the board was a "labor organization."—N. L. R. B. v. Jas. H. Matthews & Co., C.C.A.3, 156 F. 2d 706.

Continuance of status

The facts were not sufficient to destroy union's status as a "labor organization" within the National Labor Relations Act where it had never been formally dissolved, and twenty persons were asserting union's authority to act for them in their grievances against employer. —N. Activity undermining union

A dispute between an employee and employer and a union concerning employee's obligation to refrain from any "activity in the plant calculated to undermine the status of the union as the bargaining agency," as provided in contract between union and employer, was a controversy concerning terms of employment and was a "labor dispute."—Keller v. American Cyanamid Co., 28 A.2d 41, 132 N.J.Eq. 210.

Normal production in mine at effective date of statute was not decisive of question whether there was a current labor dispute, so as to entitle employees to strike without being deemed to have renounced their employment.—Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 113 F. 2d 202, modified on other grounds Phelps Dodge Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 845, 313 U.S. 177, 85 L.Ed. 1271, 133 A.L.R. 1217.

bor dispute may be said to exist in the case of a controversy over wages,[56] seniority rights,[57] working on holidays,[58] interference with the employees' right to self-organization,[59] recognition of a particular union as the sole collective bargaining agent for the employer's employees,[60] or refusal to bargain collectively with the union designated by a majority of the employees as their representative.[61] Also, a labor dispute exists where a strike is called by reason of dissatisfaction with the state of negotiations for execution of a contract touching wages and conditions of employment, notwithstanding the employer was not guilty of any unfair labor practice prior to the strike.[62]

The term "labor dispute," however, is not intended to include a dispute, the settlement of which would violate a statutory provision,[63] and, where the employer and employees are precluded by a positive provision of law from settling or adjusting wage demands without the approval of a governmental agency, a strike to obtain such wage demands without regard to the approval required by law is not a labor dispute within the statute.[64] It has been held that employees who were willing to work during regular hours, but who were discharged for refusal to work overtime without additional compensation, were not on strike or engaged in a labor dispute, within the statute.[65]

Under some statutory provisions it is not essential to the existence of a labor dispute that the disputants stand in the approximate relation of employer and employee,[66] but under other statutes, a controversy between persons who are not employer and employee has been held not to constitute such a dispute.[67] A controversy involving persons who are independent contractors rather than employees has been held not to involve a labor dispute.[68]

Railway Labor Act. A suit by an employer seeking a determination of its status, rights, and obligations with respect to a controversy between antagonistic groups of employees has been held not to involve a labor dispute within the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq.[69] The issue as to the unlawful taking of money by dining car employees from dining cars on trains moving in interstate commerce does not involve a labor dispute under the Railway Labor Act so as to preclude criminal prosecution, notwithstanding the employees are members of railroad labor unions and the claim that their conviction practically destroyed such unions.[70]

§ 28(17). Concerted Activities of Employees for Mutual Aid or Protection

The National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes generally accord to employees the right to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection.

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 7, 29 U.S.C.A. § 157, and similar statutes, employees are generally accorded the right to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection,[71] whether within or without a union.[72] The statutory right is not limited to union activities in the interrelation between employees and employer of one company,[73] and an employee has a right to join and participate in union activities outside his own employment.[74]

§ 28(18). Strikes, Jurisdictional Disputes, and Boycotts by Employees

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the right of employees to engage in concerted activities for mutual aid or protection includes the right to strike, and the statutes protect such right provided the strike is lawfully conducted.

It has been held, prior to the amendment of the National Labor Relations Act limiting employee activities, that the right of employees to engage in concerted activities for mutual aid or protection includes the right to strike[75] or to engage in secondary boycotts,[76] and that the strike may be one in protest over the treatment of a coemployee or in support of a coemployee in any other grievance connected with his work or his employer's conduct.[77] It has also been held, prior to the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, that the right of employees to strike for any cause was expressly preserved by the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 163, and similar statutes, providing that nothing in the statute should be construed so as to interfere with, or impede or diminish in any way, the right to strike.[78] It has been held that the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, does not outlaw the right to strike, but merely aims to prevent the necessity for its exercise.[79]

Under statutory provisions dealing with the right of employees to strike and restrictions on such right, the word "strike" must be given its plain and ordinary signification in the absence of a legislative definition at variance.[80] In the application of such statutes, the word "strike" means an act of quitting work, specifically such an act done by mutual understanding by a body of workmen as a means of enforcing compliance with demands made on the employer to obtain or resist a change in conditions of employment;[81] the term ordinarily connotes a movement growing out of problems arising between the employee and employer class, relating to hours, wages, or employment conditions, in the course of which there is a concerted suspension of employment by the employees for the purpose of enforcing certain demands against the employer.[82] A "jurisdictional dispute" has been defined as one in which classes of employees engage in a controversy with their employer and with one another concerning the right to control a particular matter.[83]

Statutory provisions affirming the right of employees to engage in strikes and lawful concerted activities do not protect all strikes and concerted activities but only those lawfully conducted,[84] and employees are not authorized to commit acts of violence, to take possession of the employer's property, or forcibly to prevent ingress and egress.[85] However, the question whether a strike constitutes lawful concerted activity is not dependent solely on whether the employees have or have not committed violence.[86] The statute does not countenance activities which would flout the fundamental rights and obligations lying at the foundation of the relation of employer and employee,[87] or authorize repeated work stoppages at times when the services of employees were needed most.[88] So, also, a "wildcat strike" by a minority of the employees in violation of the purposes of the statute and of the agreement existing between employer and employees for orderly collective bargaining is not protected by the statute.[89] The provision of the statute preserving to individuals or groups of employees the right to present grievances to the employer negatives by necessary implication the right on their part to call strikes for the purpose of influencing the bargaining being carried on by chosen representatives of all the employees.[90] A minority union, although having no standing as the collective bargaining agent of employees covered by an election held by the board, may strike or otherwise manifest dissatisfaction or opposition to the results of the election, notwithstanding the designation of another union as the sole bargaining agent, as long as the minority union pursues lawful means to publicize its grievances.[91]

Where the minds of the parties to an agreement between striking employees and employer did not meet with respect to certain matters, a strike, in effect after the so-called agreement, is not a new strike but a continuation of the one called prior thereto.[92] An employee cannot be on a strike and at work simultaneously, but must be on the job subject to the authority and control of the employer or off the job as a striker in support of such grievance.[93]

§ 28(19). Acts of Labor Organizations in General

Labor unions have the right to interfere by lawful means between an employer and his employees, even though the latter are not members of the union where the purpose of such interference is to advance the interest of the members of the union, notwithstanding consequent hardship imposed on individual employers or employees; but harm done thereby can be countenanced only if the purpose is, in the eye of the law, sufficient to justify such harm.

Refusal to perform some of tasks

While employees could strike to assist other striking employees of employer's plant in another city, employees could not remain at their positions, accept wages paid to them, and at same time select what part of their allotted tasks they cared to perform, or refuse, openly or secretly, to employer's damage, to do other work on ground that performance of such work would work to detriment of such other striking employees.—N. L. R. B. v. Montgomery Ward & Co., C.C.A.8, 157 F.2d 486.

ful means between an employer and his employees who are not members of the union where the purpose of such interference is solely to advance the interest of the members of the union, notwithstanding consequent hardship imposed on individual employers or employees,[94] but harm done to another or to the public by such unions can be countenanced only if the purpose, in the eye of the law, is sufficient to justify such harm.[95] Acts of a union which have any reasonable connection with wages, hours of employment, health, safety, and the right of collective bargaining or any other condition of employment or for the protection from labor abuses have been held to be justified,[96] but the leaders of a labor union cannot make an illegal objective legal merely by the use of a legal method such as a strike to obtain that objective,[97] and a labor union is not free from legal responsibility for injury inflicted by the union in obtaining an objective which is not a lawful labor objective.[98] It is not a lawful labor objective for a union to insist that machinery be discarded in order that manual labor may take its place, and thus secure additional opportunity of employment,[99] or to eliminate from economic life businessmen-workers operating without aid of employees.[1] Where labor objectives of a union are illegal, the courts must control,[2] and, when doubt arises as to whether a contemplated objective is within the legal sphere, it is for the courts to determine.[3] The question whether a union rule against the doing of journeymen's work by employers is just, reasonable, or wise is one of policy which concerns only the union and its members, and may not be raised by an employer not a member of the union.[4] It has been held that a union may lawfully engage in a controversy with an employer with respect to his conduct in performing part of his own works.[5]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a union may lawfully resort to concerted activities to win over the employees with the object of gaining a closed shop agreement,[6] and members of a union

Validity of closed-shop contracts see infra § 28 (40).

Under National Labor Relations Act, it has been held that a union may engage in concerted activities to win over a majority of employees to a closed shop, notwithstanding union does not then represent a majority or even if union does not include any members who are in employ of particular employer.—Park & Tilford Import Corp. v. or group of affiliated unions are privileged to refuse to work on the same job with other workmen whether or not the latter have united or organized themselves into a separate trade union,[7] but the National Labor Relations Act does not give labor unions a right to maintain a closed or partially closed membership together with a closed-shop agreement.[8]

Strike or refusal to work generally. The right of the members of a union to strike[9] or to refuse to work for any particular employer,[10] or to withdraw from the service of one whose terms or actions are objectionable to them[11] is generally recognized, so long as they do not violate an express contract[12] or a statute,[13] and as long as their primary object is accomplishment of the purpose of their organization,[14] and not the mere gratification of personal malice,[15] or the injuring of others.[16] A strike must be for a lawful purpose,[17] and a strike for both a legal and an illegal purpose is wholly illegal.[18] Those who attack the validity of a strike must prove that it comes within an express exception to the right to strike.[19]

The members of a labor union may thus singly or in a body leave the services of their employers in order to compel a reduction in the hours of labor,[20] to secure any other lawful benefit to their several members,[21] to secure for themselves all the work of their trade,[22] or, as discussed infra § 81, to compel an advance of wages. Where not under contract to render service for a specified time, the members of a labor union may unite in refusing to work for an employer who, after notice, continues in his employment one who is not a member of their society,[23] or who is a member of a rival organization;[24] and they may withdraw in a body from service under such conditions.[25] They may thus withdraw to prevent the use of materials made up by nonunion labor.[26] Although a strike for the purpose of organizing nonunion employees has been held lawful,[27] it has also been held that such a strike which has for its purpose the complete unionizing of labor and the doing away with nonunion labor is unlawful.[28] The right to strike, however, exists only as against employers with whom the union has a trade dispute.[29] A strike to prevent one from carrying on a lawful trade is illegal.[30]

The right to strike includes the right to win over others to its support,[31] provided such other persons may do so without violating any contract with the employer,[32] and pay the expenses of those thus persuaded to leave,[33] and post in the place of the strikers' assembly the names of all persons contributing, or refusing to contribute, to such expenses.[34] Strikers may also persuade others not to take their places.[35] These rights are not affected by the fact that the employer is a receiver;[36] nor is the legality of such acts affected by the fact that loss results to the employer.[37]

It is legal for a labor union by means of a strike to secure the discharge of objectionable persons[38] and procure employment for its members.[39] Such act is legal, however, only when its purpose is to secure employment or benefit for members of the union.[40] It has been held to become unlawful when its design is to coerce the nonunion man to become a member of the society and come under its rules and conditions,[41] or to deprive him of the opportunity to labor.[42] However laudable the object of a strike, the means used in its conduct must not be unlawful or contrary to public policy.[43] The union may not resort to force, intimidation, threats, or coercion[44] to prevent others from entering the employment of their abandoned employers,[45] or to coerce dealers and users into starving the business of their employers.[46]

Sit-down strike. Attempted coercion of an employer to enforce demands by taking possession of the employer's property has no recognition under the law,[47] and the withholding of such property by individuals who had formerly been employed thereon but who claimed the right by sit-down strike to remain for the purpose of coercing the employer into granting their claims is unauthorized.[48]

Picketing. Picketing as an aid to strike is not unlawful,[49] provided it does not consist of coercive or otherwise unlawful acts,[50] or amount to an invasion of the rights of others.[51] The right of

When picketing is sought to be justified under statute authorizing "peaceably and without threat or intimidation being on any public street or highway or thoroughfare for the purpose of obtaining or communicating information," the purpose for which persons are to be unpeaceful picketing does not arise under the National Labor Relations Act;[52] or was the Act intended to prevent one labor union from peacefully picketing the plant of an employer who recognizes another union as bargaining agent where the purpose of the picketing was to urge employees who are members of the bargaining agent to pursue a course similar to that followed by the picketing union in a campaign waged by both unions to increase wages in the industry,[53] although the right of a minority union peacefully to picket the plant of an employer who has entered into a closed-shop agreement with a union certified as the sole collective bargaining agent of the employees, for the purpose of interfering with or abrogating that agreement, has been denied where there was no labor dispute between the employer and the picketing union.[54]

2. Collective Bargaining

§ 28(20). Collective Bargaining in General

Collective bargaining is a procedure looking toward the making of a collective agreement between the employer and the accredited representative of his employees concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.

Collective bargaining is a procedure looking toward the making of a collective agreement between the employer and the accredited representative of his employees concerning wages, hours, and other conditions of employment.[55] It involves the right of members of a labor organization, either through a committee or through a representative, to confer with the employer, and to present their claims or grievances as to hours, wages, and general conditions incident to their employment, with the end in view of arriving at a reasonable and amicable adjustment of such matters.[56] The right of collective bargaining is necessarily a continuing right, and it is not a detached or isolated procedure which, once reflected in a written agreement, becomes a final and permanent result.[57] The right to organize is essential to the right to bargain collectively.[58]

The right of employees to bargain collectively and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection has long been recognized by the courts and public opinion as lawful and in the public interest,[59] and it has been expressly provided for

Other definitions

(1) A broad definition of "collective bargaining" is an agreement between an employer and a labor union which regulates terms and conditions of employment with reference to hours of labor and wages, and deals also with strikes, lockouts, walkouts, arbitration, shop conditions, safety devices, the enforceability and interpretation of such agreement and of numerous other relations existing between employer and employee.—Railway Mail Ass'n v. Kan.—Betts v. Easley, 169 P.2d 831, 161 Kan. 459.

Although not defined in Railway Labor Act, "collective bargaining" generally has been considered to absorb and give statutory approval to philosophy of bargaining as worked out in the labor movement in United States.—Order of Railroad Telegraphers v. Railway Exp. Agency, Ga., 64 S.Ct. 582, 321 U.S. 342, 88 L.Ed. 788.

The purpose of the Railway Labor Act in providing for a representative of a craft or class of employees is to secure benefits of agreements which represent the strength and bargaining power and serve the welfare of the group and not to deprive them or any of them of the benefits of collective bargaining for the advantage of the representative or those members of the class who selected it.—Steele v. Louisville & N. R. Co., Ala., 65 S.Ct. 226, 323 U.S. 192, 89 L.Ed. 173.

The basic principle of legislation recognizing the policy of collective bargaining between railroads and their employees is that there must be some agency vested with authority to represent and bind all of the employees of each craft or class, whether or not members of a labor organization, for the preservation of the rights of the employees and for the protection of the public.—Brisbin v. As giving right to particular employees

(1) A constitutional provision which merely protects the right of collective bargaining does not give the right of collective bargaining to any group of employees.—Miami Water Works Local No. 654 v. City of Miami, Fla., 26 So.2d 194.

(2) Accordingly such a provision does not give right of collective bargaining to union whose membership is composed of employees of munici-collective bargaining is a fundamental[64] or natural[65] right which the federal statutes[66] and state statutes and constitutional provisions[67] have merely affirmed and not created, although it has been held that the National Labor Relations Act basically reconstructed the right.[68] The court must construe the collective bargaining provisions of labor relations statutes so as to give effect to their social purposes, to avoid labor strife, and to promote labor peace.[69]

Employers have the right to bargain as a group with employee organizations in a given trade in the matter of wages or of trade rules and working conditions.[70]

§ 28(21). —— Duty to Bargain in General

Under a number of statutes the employer has the duty to engage in collective bargaining with his employees.

In accordance with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq,[71] of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq,[72] and of various state statutes,[73] the employer has the duty to engage in collective bargaining with his employees. Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes the duty exists only after the statutory bargaining representative re-

Refusal to bargain collectively as unfair labor practice see infra § 28 (45) e.

Employer's announcement of new wage scale without prior agreement and while negotiations were still in progress constituted an attempt to settle unilaterally matters with respect to which employer was under a statutory duty to deal with the union.—N. Majority support

An employer is under duty to bargain collectively as soon as union representative presents convincing evidence of majority support for the union.—N. L. R. B. v. Dahlstrom Metallic Door Co., C.C.A.2, 112 F.2d 756.

Employee's consent to violation

The statute may not be ignored by employer even though the employees consent, or the employees suggest conduct found to be an unfair labor practice, at least where employer is in a position to secure an advantage from the practice.—Medo Photo Supply Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 830, 321 U.S. 678, 88 L.Ed. 1007.

Provision of Railway Labor Act commanding employer to "treat with" authorized representative of employees for collective bargaining requires employer to meet and confer with such representative, to listen to complaints, and to make reasonable effort to compose differences, as against contention that command requires employer to meet representative only if and when he should elect to negotiate with representative.—Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, supra.

Federal Transportation Act of 1920 did not require the railway company to recognize or to deal with or confer with labor unions, and it did not require employees to deal with their employers through their fellow employees.—Pennsylvania R. Consideration of standards of living

In wage controversy, employer should be willing to consider in good faith the present standard of living and salaries or wages paid to employees in similar lines of endeavor. —New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Charles C. Loehmann Corp., 56 N.Y.S.2d 485, 269 App.Div. 566.

quests the employer to bargain collectively,[74] and the employer need not take the initiative in seeking a contract or request his employees to participate in negotiations for purposes of collective bargaining.[75] After a request to bargain has been made by the employees through their representative it is not incumbent on the employees to renew continually the proposal to bargain,[76] but after the employer has entered into negotiations for collective bargaining, and the negotiations are suspended with no arrangement for further meeting, the employees must request further negotiations to impose the duty on the employer.[77] The employer is not excused from compliance with the statute because of economic hardships,[78] because his plant is shut down,[79] by reason of the fact that union organizers have stated to employees that persons not joining the union would lose their jobs when the union was recognized,[80] or by reason of the fact that the union has proposed a preferential shop.[81] If the union offers in good faith to negotiate, the employer may not refuse because of the union's past misconduct.[82] The employer violates the statute when he refuses to bargain except on conditions which are unreasonable or which interfere with the employees' rights given by the statute.[83]

§ 28(22). —— Subjects of Collective Bargaining

Generally, where collective bargaining is required by statute, the employer must negotiate with respect to all matters which affect his employees as a class or which involve legitimate collective bargaining.

Generally, where collective bargaining is required by statute, the employer must negotiate with respect to all matters which affect his employees as a class[84] or which involve legitimate collective bargaining,[85] and a refusal to bargain as to matters which are proper subjects for collective bargaining indicates a lack of good faith.[86] Accordingly the employer is under the duty to bargain collectively before making changes in existing contracts,[87] but the employee's breach of contract does not leave the employer under an obligation to initiate negotiations for a new contract.[88] Exceptional as well as routine matters are properly the subjects for collective bargaining.[89]

Change in working conditions prior to agreement

Where no collective bargaining agreement is in force, the carrier, by making individual agreements which change working conditions, does not violate the provision of the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 152, which prohibits changes in collective bargaining agreements without resort to the procedure prescribed by the act, although negotiations for a collective agreement are pending. —Williams v. Wages or rates of pay,[90] hours of employment,[91] conditions of employment,[92] and the method for presenting and adjusting grievances[93] are proper subjects for collective bargaining. The interpretation of ambiguous provisions of the contract is a matter for collective bargaining,[94] but where the provisions of the contract are not ambiguous the employer need not negotiate as to their interpretation.[95] Where the closed shop is not prohibited by statute it constitutes a proper subject for collective bargaining.[96] Collection of union dues is not in its nature a matter for collective bargaining required by the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq,[97] but it may properly be included in a collective bargaining contract, as considered infra § 103.

§ 28(23). —— Conduct of Collective Bargaining Negotiations

Under labor relations statutes which require collective bargaining, mere pretended bargaining by the employer is not sufficient; the employer must bargain in good faith.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, mere pretended bargaining by the employer is not sufficient to constitute collective bargaining;[98] the employer must bargain in good faith.[99] Collective bargain-

"Working conditions"

(1) The phrase "working conditions" within provision of Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 152, that no carrier shall change working conditions except as prescribed in agreement with employees or in the act means such conditions affecting work of employees as might be subject of agreement between carrier and employees.—In re Chicago North Shore & M. Types of dispute recognized by statute

The Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq., recognizes two types of disputes arising between railway management and employees which may be adjusted thereunder, the first relating to disputes over formation of collective agreements or efforts to secure them looking to acquisition of rights for the future, and the second contemplating existence of a collective agreement or a situation in which no effort is made to change terms of employment and dispute, relates either to meaning or proper application of a particular provision with reference to a specific situation or to an omitted case.—Murphre v. ing contemplates an exchange of information, ideas, and theories in open discussion, and an honest attempt to arrive at an agreement,[1] and both sides have the duty to enter the discussion with an open and fair mind, and with a sincere purpose to find a basis for agreement.[2] The employer need not continue the discussion indefinitely,[3] particularly where the employees refuse to perform their contract.[4] The National Labor Relations Board has authority under the National Labor Relations Act to determine whether the employer was acting in good faith.[5]

Collective bargaining has no reference to the terms of the agreement offered as long as the parties negotiate in good faith,[6] but the insistence by the employer on an agreement which would be illegal indicates that the employer is not bargaining in good faith.[7] It is not illegal for either the employer or the employees' representative to offer a unilateral draft of a contemplated agreement[8] unless he has a fixed determination not to recede from the terms therein expressed.[9] The employer may properly refuse terms proposed by the employees,[10] but he is not free to refuse without consideration

Test

(1) The sincerity of employer's effort in negotiating must be tested by length of time involved in negotiations and persistence with which employer offers opportunity for agreement.—N. L. R. B. v. P. Lorillard Co., C.C.A.6, 117 F.2d 921, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 397, 314 U.S. 512, 86 L.Ed. 380—N. L. R. B. v. Sands Mfg. Sound business judgment

Refusal to meet the demands of the bargaining agent based on sound business judgment is not refusal to bargain.—Yellow Cab Operating Co. v. Taxi-Cab Drivers Local Union No. 889 of Oklahoma City, D.C.Okl., 35 F.Supp. 403, reversed on other all proposals looking to an agreement,[11] and if the employees request a counter-proposal he should make it.[12] Rights possessed by the employees may not be withheld by the employer for the purpose of making a better bargain as to some other provision of the contract in the process of negotiation.[13]

Bargaining in a labor dispute must be at arm's length,[14] but the employees are not required to adopt a militant attitude in the exercise of their guaranteed rights.[15] The National Labor Relations Act does not require that bargaining must be pursued in a particular manner,[16] and it does not limit the right of the employer and employees to agree on the mode in which bargaining is done.[17] The board is not authorized to shape or control the course of negotiations as long as the employer bargains with the employees collectively, in accordance with the statute.[18] The adjustment of grievances by conferences between the employer and the employees' representative, and, in event of failure, by arbitration, is a bargaining process.[19]

§ 28(24). Representative for Collective Bargaining in General

In accordance with provisions of labor relations statutes, the employer must recognize the chosen representative of the employees as the exclusive bargaining agent of all employees in the bargaining unit.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, the employer must recognize the chosen representative of the employees as the bargaining agent of all employees in the bargaining unit,[20] if recognition is requested,[21] even though such representative also represents employees in a rival industry[22] or even though a rival union threatens economic reprisals.[23] The obligation is exclusive and the employer has the negative duty to bargain with no one else,[24] including rival unions[25] or individual employees,[26] even though the employees ask that the obligation be disregarded.[27] On the other hand, an employer has the legal right to deal exclusively with the agency which represents the employees[28] and he is not required by the statute to negotiate with other persons.[29] If the majority of employees has not selected a representative, the employer may bargain with different groups of his employees.[30] An employer may refuse to bargain with a union which declines to accept its responsibility and insists on bargaining only for its own members.[31]

An employer must furnish a representative for personal conferences with the representative of the employees,[32] and, unless the employees assent to another arrangement, he must make his representative available for conferences at the industrial site at reasonable times and places.[33] The employer must not preclude the employees from their right to confer with their representatives.[34]

In the absence of statutory prohibition, employers may lawfully unite in designating a common agent for negotiation,[35] and such a prohibition will not be imported into labor law on inference alone.[36] Bargaining by employers through a common agent is authorized by a statute which provides that the term "employer" includes any person acting on behalf of or in the interest of an employer, directly or indirectly.[37]

Employees on strike. Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the employer continues to be legally obligated to negotiate with the union representing the employees although the employees are on strike where the strike is lawful,[38] and even though the strike is not lawful he must negotiate with the union where he continues to treat the strikers as his employees.[39] Where a strike is unlawful and in violation of contract the employer who has replaced the strikers with new employees is not required to bargain further with the representative of the strikers.[40]

Grievances. In the matter of representation, collective bargaining as to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other conditions of employment is to be distinguished from grievances,[41] and the employer is not obligated by the National Labor Relations Act or similar statutes to negotiate concerning grievances of individual employees only with the representative chosen by the majority of the employees.[42]

§ 28(25). Freedom in Choice of Representative

As a general rule under labor relations statutes which provide for collective bargaining, employees are entitled to a free exercise of their choice of a bargaining representative, and the employer must refrain from all acts which interfere with this right.

The essence of collective bargaining is the employees' freedom of choice in the selection of their bargaining representative,[43] and, as a general rule under labor relations statutes which provide for collective bargaining, employees are entitled to a free exercise of their choice of a bargaining representative.[44] Accordingly the employer must refrain from all acts which interfere with the employees in their choice of a collective bargaining agent.[45] The employer must take no part in the original formation or in the maintenance of a labor organization for collective bargaining,[46] even though he may be actuated by good motives,[47] and in a contest between rival unions for the right to represent the employees he must remain neutral.[48] Interference without domination of a labor organization is sufficient to constitute a violation of labor relations statutes.[49] Where the employer has been guilty of interference he should plainly and openly disavow any intention to continue the interference,[50] and if the labor organization of his employees is under his domination he should disestablish it.[51]

Broad interpretation of statute

The National Labor Relations Act must be broadly interpreted to cover any conduct of employer intended to bring into being an organization which he has reason to believe will be friendly.—N. L. R. B. v. Griswold Mfg. Co., C.C.A.3, 106 F.2d 713.

Participation by employees

Participation by a large majority of employees in annual elections under a company plan of employee representation did not as matter of law make plan the employees' freely chosen method of representation.—Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation Limited v. Notice

Where a company union or plan was required to be disorganized as illegal and notice to show termination of domination thereof given, no particular form of notice is required under the National Labor Relations Act, although any notice, in order to be valid, must constitute actual notice of the true situation and not a statement of facts from which many inferences might be drawn.—Western Elec. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 147 F.2d 519, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 1014, 324 U.S. 870, 89 L.Ed. 1424 —Point Breeze Emp. Ass'n v. N. L. R. tive may not be controlled by the labor relations board,[52] but the board may determine which labor union is the choice of the majority of employees, as considered infra § 28 (33) f, and, if the employees' selection of a bargaining representative is made under circumstances which show that such selection does not reflect the free choice of the employees, the selection is not binding on the board.[53] The board alone may decide when employees, who have been acting through a dominated representative, have so far shaken off the effect of so doing as to be able to exercise a free choice.[54]

What constitutes domination or interference. Domination of a labor organization by the employer means to master, to rule, or to control,[55] whereas interference may include any substantial intermeddling.[56] In order to constitute domination or interference by the employer it must appear that the employees acted for the employer rather than for themselves, or that the employer gave aid to one group which he withheld from the other, or discriminated in favor of a labor organization or against nonmembers.[57] Whether the union is dominated does not depend on abject servility of the union; the test is whether there is collective bargaining free from all taints of an employer's domination or influence.[58] An employer's interference or domination may be shown by specific acts or by a course of conduct,[59] and the acts or conduct may be committed by employees acting for the employer.[60] Where employees have just cause to believe that solicitors professedly for a labor organization are acting for management, the employees do not have complete and unhampered freedom of choice.[61] Statutory provisions prohibiting domination or interference

Protection of rights
The rights of employees to join a great international union, to organize a so-called inside union, or to refuse to join or create or assist any labor organization, are of equal value, and in administering the National Labor Relations Act each right is entitled to the protection of the National Labor Relations Board. —N. Employer's representatives on governing council
Where representatives of employer were on governing council of an unaffiliated labor organization and its basic law recognized restraints on action by employer representatives, the organization was a labor organization dominated by the employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 130 F.2d 363.

Functional weakness of organization
The functional weakness of collective bargaining organization of employees in single department of employer's business is not itself proof of employer domination of such organization, but is factor which should lead court to scrutinize carefully all circumstances surrounding its formation in determining question of its legality.—McKay v. Retail Automobile Salesmen's Local Union No. 1067, 106 P.2d 373, 16 Cal. 2d 311, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 939, 313 U.S. 566, 85 L.Ed. 1525.

must not be construed so strictly as to destroy the purpose of the statute or the legislative intent.[62]

Various acts or statements by the employer have been held not to constitute interference with the employees' freedom in the choice of a bargaining agency.[63] If no element of intimidation is present an employer's expression of opinion as to the disadvantages of belonging to a union[64] or his expression of preference for one union instead of another[65] is not necessarily interference. An employer may encourage membership in a union with which he has a valid closed-shop agreement,[66] but he may not do so where the contract is not a closed-shop agreement.[67] An employer may permit his employees to solicit membership in a union during working hours if he does not withhold a like privilege from employees soliciting membership in an opposing union.[68] A statute which protects the employees' right to choose representatives does not interfere with the employer's right to make and enforce rules and orders which are necessary for the proper conduct of his business.[69]

Payment of representative. Employees' representatives should not be paid by the employer when engaged in the performance of their duties as representatives, in order that they will be free from any possible influence of favor from the employer.[70]

§ 28(26). Who May Act as Representative

a. In general
b. Organization favored by employer
c. Successor to favored union
d. Person authorized to conduct negotiations

a. In General

Any organization which represents the free choice of the majority of employees in the bargaining unit is the proper representative of such employees for the purpose of collective bargaining.

Any organization which represents the free choice of the majority of employees in the bargaining unit is the proper representative of such employees for the purpose of collective bargaining[71] even though many of the employees are members of a minority union.[72] In the absence of unfair labor practices by the employer, a union which does not represent a majority of employees may not require the employer to bargain with it,[73] but such a union may represent its own members until it is superseded by a union representing the majority of employees.[74] A union affiliated with a national organization may be a proper representative,[75] but an inside or independent union may be a proper representative as well as a union affiliated with a national organization.[76] After a labor organization has been duly certified as the bargaining agent, a new labor organization may not represent the employers until a reasonable period of time has elapsed after the certification,[77] but a new labor organization which is formed after the contract with the old organization has expired may properly represent the employees for the negotiation of a new contract.[78]

A union which agrees to arbitrate differences is not thereby disqualified from acting as bargaining agent.[79]

The fact that the employer has not given unlawful aid to a union does not of itself render the union the appropriate bargaining agency.[80]

b. Organization Favored by Employer

As a general rule under the labor relations statutes an organization which is controlled, influenced, or unlawfully aided by the employer is incapacitated to act as bargaining representative for the employees even though such organization has been designated by a majority of the employees as bargaining agent.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, an organization which is controlled, influenced, or unlawfully aided by the employer is incapacitated to act as bargaining representative for the employees[81] until measures are taken to disabuse the employees of any belief that they will win the employer's approval if they remain in it or incur his displeasure if they leave,[82] even though it has been designated by a majority of the employees as bargaining agent.[83] After all vestige of the employer's domination or influence has been removed, the employees have a right to choose the union which was formerly favored by the employer.[84] The purpose of the prohibition against the employer-dominated union is to prevent the rights of the employees from being nullified by an organization which is responsive to the will of the employer.[85] subjective from the standpoint of employees.[86] A union may in fact be employer-dominated even though the employer has stopped all active interference.[87] Harmonious relations between the employer and the union,[88] the employer's observance of a closed-shop agreement with a union,[89] or the fact that the employer did not grant many requests of the union and the preliminary contract has no provision fixing wages, hours, or seniority[90] does not necessarily indicate that the union is dominated by the employer.

c. Successor to Favored Union

A successor to a disestablished company union may properly be the bargaining representative, but there must be a definite, clear line of cleavage between the two organizations.

Where the employer has disestablished a company union, a successor to the company union may properly be the bargaining representative[91] even though it is closely parallel in form to the original employer-dominated organization,[92] but there must be a definite, clear line of cleavage between the two organizations.[93] Historical continuity may indicate that the successor organization is employer-dominated.[94]

d. Person Authorized to Conduct Negotiations

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, neither the employer nor the union has any right to determine the individual or individuals who shall personally conduct the negotiations for the other party.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, neither the employer[95] nor the union[96] has any right to determine the individual or individuals who shall personally conduct the negotiations for the other party. An employer is under no legal obligation to bargain through any particular officer,[97] and an employer need not be represented by a person competent to enter into an agreement,[98] but the character and powers of the negotiating officer may be indicative of the employer's good faith.[99]

The labor relations board is without power to say which particular person may conduct the negotiations for an agreement,[1] and therefore it is without authority to direct an employer corporation to cease and desist from using the services of a certain individual in preparing an agreement to present to its employees.[2]

§ 28(27). Proof of Authority of Representative

No specific form of authority to represent employees as their collective bargaining agent is necessary, and such authority may be given by action as well as by words.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, no specific form of authority to represent employees as their collective bargaining agent is necessary,[3] and such authority may be given by action as well as by words.[4] Rules or principles of construction of the authorization should be simple, liberal, and of the common-sense variety.[5] Voting in an election is not the only way in which an employee may express his choice of a bargaining representative;[6] he may designate an organization as his representative by signing a statement of express authorization,[7] or by signing a membership[8] or checkoff[9] card, or by signing an application for membership in the organization,[10] even though he has paid no dues.[11] The fact that an employee has signed a union affiliation card on Sunday does not impair the majority representation thus obtained by the union,[12] nor does the fact that the union member is a minor render voidable his authorization of the union to bargain for him.[13] It is immaterial whether the employees are members of, or even entitled to membership in, the union designated by them as their bargaining agency.[14]

When the employer in good faith questions the majority status of the bargaining representative, it is the representative's duty to offer proof of the majority status or to suggest some reasonable method for proving his claim of a majority,[15] and it is

Or.—Stone Logging & Contracting Co. v. International Woodworkers of America, Columbia District Council No. 5, 135 P.2d 759, 171 Or. 13.

Challenge of majority status

A statement by superintendent during conference that employer might even question right of union to represent majority did not amount the employer's duty to accept such offer.[16] The employer may not dictate an arbitrary method of proof.[17] The bargaining process need not be delayed until an election is ordered by the labor relations board[18] or until the union has been certified as bargaining agent by the board.[19] Where the employer has refused to bargain collectively on general grounds, he cannot excuse his refusal on the ground that sufficient proof that the labor organization represented the majority of employees was not furnished him,[20] and where he has made no effort to learn the facts as to the labor organization's authority to represent the employees he may not base his refusal to bargain on the claim that he did not know whether the organization was properly accredited.[21]

Employees who do not question the authority of the representative purporting to act for them in the negotiation of a contract with their employer may not attack the representative's authority after the contract has been made.[22]

Agreement between unions. An agreement by two unions affiliated with the same parent organization to abide by the decision of the parent organization as to which union has the right to organize the employees is not binding where one of the unions withdraws from the organization before the decision, and the employer is not justified, on the basis of the agreement, in recognizing as the bargaining representative the union in whose favor the parent organization has decided.[23]

Persons counted in determining majority. Employees ousted by virtue of an unfair labor practice of the employer remain employees for the purpose of determining majority representation by the union,[24] but striking employees who are properly discharged for unlawful acts are not to be counted[25] unless they are reëmployed.[26] Persons who are employed to replace employees engaged in a lawful strike are not to be counted in determin-to a challenge of the union's majority, imposing burden on union to make such proof.—N. L. R. B. v. Algoma Plywood & Veneer Co., C.C. A.7, 121 F.2d 602.

Membership list

An employer's demand that production of union's membership list was sole method of proof that union represented majority of employees was arbitrary, and refusal to comply with demand did not justify refusal to bargain.—N. ing the number of employees needed to constitute a majority,[27] but persons who are employed to replace employees engaged in an unlawful strike are to be counted.[28] Employees who sign up with two unions are not to be counted for either in determining which one has a majority.[29] Membership cards in a union are not to be disregarded because of threats of the union organizer that employees who do not join the union might lose their positions.[30]

§ 28(28). Collective Bargaining Units

The unit of employees appropriate for the purpose of choosing a representative to negotiate with the employer and the extent of the discretion of the labor relations board to determine appropriate collective bargaining units are dependent on the provisions of the labor relations statutes.

Some labor relations statutes expressly state what constitutes a collective bargaining unit for the purpose of choosing a representative to negotiate with the employer. Thus under some statutes a collective bargaining unit consists of all the employees of one employer except where a majority of employees engaged in a single craft have voted to constitute such group a separate bargaining unit,[31] and the labor relations board or commission may determine whether a certain group of employees constitutes a craft for this purpose.[32] The Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, contemplates the preservation of existing crafts and classes of employees as units for collective bargaining,[33] and the power to determine the occupational boundaries that comprehend a craft or class for collective bargaining purposes is vested in the National Mediation Board,[34] which has a large discretion in making this determination,[35] although it must base its decision on reasonable grounds.[36]

In accordance with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar provisions of other labor relations statutes, the labor relations board is empowered to determine appropriate collective bargaining units,[37] and

"Appropriate"

(1) Under provision of state labor relations act authorizing state board to decide in each case whether the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining should be employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or any other unit, the requirement that the unit be "appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining" enjoined on the board ascertainable rules of decision for performance of its function of deciding the appropriate unit.—Metropolitan Life Ins. (2) The statutory requirement that employees' collective bargaining units be "appropriate" means that they must be practically adapted to purpose of collective bargaining in existing situation.—Jordan Marsh Co. v. Labor Relations Commission, 56 N.E.2d 915, 316 Mass. 748.

In the absence of statutory direction otherwise, the board may properly decide that all employees of a single employer form the most suitable unit for collective bargaining[51] or it may decide that the workers in any craft or plant or subdivision thereof are more appropriate.[52] Where the circumstances are such that the board reasonably could conclude that either the craft or the plant unit would be appropriate for collective bargaining purposes, and where either contention, if unopposed, would be adopted by the board, it has been held that the board ordinarily will give paramount weight to the wishes of the employees within the craft unit.[53] The right of one group to collective bargaining may not be

Possibility of organization in one division

Where employer's bus operations were organized into two divisions and board was of opinion that either a company-wide or division bargaining unit would be appropriate, it was proper for the board to consider the fact that organization for collective bargaining was possible in a division but not for the wider unit, in making its determination in favor of the divisional unit.—N. Before expiration of agreement with employer

Where the majority of the employes of one craft group within a plant petition to have their craft union designated as their collective bargaining agent at a time when there is a valid closed-shop agreement between the employer and an independent union of which they are members, the board may properly designate the craft union to be the collective bargaining agent of the craft employes at the expiration of the agreement in effect at the time of the petition.—Petition of Grant Bldg., 45 Pa.Dist. & Co. 442.

Superintendents of apartment houses

The labor relations board's order to apartment house owners and managers to bargain collectively with a union representing building superintendents, although each building had but a single superintendent, should be enforced, as against the contention that bargaining with a representative of a single employee could not be collective bargaining.—In re New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 52 N.Y. S.2d 590, 183 Misc. 1064, affirmed 58 N.Y.S.2d 343, 269 App.Div. 934, affirmed 66 N.E.2d 853, 295 N.Y. 839.

denied because other employees do not desire to organize and assert collective rights,[54] but it has been held that a group of employees whose interests are shared in common by all the employees may not be designated as a bargaining unit where the majority of the employees do not desire to bargain collectively.[55]

After the entry of an order designating the appropriate unit for collective bargaining, the employer may not be compelled by any other agency of the government to perform acts inconsistent with that order.[56]

Employees with confidential information. Office employees who possess confidential employer information are not for that reason improperly included in a bargaining unit if the nature of their duties does not give them access to confidential information with respect to labor relations.[57]

Guards. In the absence of a statutory prohibition, plant guards may constitute an appropriate bargaining unit,[58] and the bargaining unit may be affiliated with the same union which represents the production and maintenance employees.[59]

Supervisory employees. In the absence of a statutory prohibition, supervisory employees may constitute an appropriate bargaining unit,[60] but ordinarily they should not be included in a bargaining unit with the subordinate employees,[61] although they may be so included,[62] or they may select a union which represents subordinate employees,[63] if no incompatibility with their full and proper allegiance to their employer thereby arises.

Matters for consideration by board
In determining proper collective bargaining unit for militarized guards and deciding whether they should be permitted to choose union also representing production and maintenance employees, national labor relations board must not be guided alone by wishes of guards or union, or by what is appropriate in case of nonmilitarized guards, but must also consider guards' military duties and obligations, their possible relationships to union representing other employees, and limitations on normal freedom to choose representative necessitated by war effort. —N. § 28(29). Administrative Determination of Unit Representation

In accordance with statutory provisions, the labor relations board or other administrative agency designated by statute has exclusive jurisdiction to determine disputes concerning who is authorized to represent the employees in bargaining with the employer.

In accordance with the provisions of labor relations statutes, the labor relations board or other administrative agency designated by the particular statute has exclusive jurisdiction to determine disputes concerning who is authorized to represent the employees in bargaining with the employer,[64] and this grant of authority by the statute to the administrative agency excludes determination of the matter by the courts.[65] The labor relations board can determine the representative only when a question of representation arises.[66] The question should be determined as of the date of the hearing rather than as of the date the proceeding was instituted.[67] The board has a wide degree of discretion in establishing the procedure and safeguards necessary to insure the fair and free choice of bargaining representatives by employees.[68] The fact that two unions claiming the right to represent the employees are members of the same national labor organization which requires disputes to be settled by the national organization does not deprive the labor relations board of jurisdiction to act under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes,[69] but under some state statutes the state labor relations board has no power to investigate and determine which of two labor organizations affiliated with the same parent labor organization has the right to represent employees in collective bargaining.[70]

In the absence of statutory restrictions the labor board may make a determination, when properly requested, at any time,[71] and the fact that a contract between an employer and the representative of the employees is in existence does not preclude the board from conducting an investigation to determine who shall represent the employees in the future.[72]

The authority to determine the representative does not include authority to define the type of work that each class or craft must do.[73]

§ 28(30). —— Nature of Proceedings

A proceeding for the determination of the bargaining representative by the labor relations board is not litigation; it is of a nonadversary, fact-finding character.

A proceeding for the determination of the bargaining representative by the labor relations board is not litigation;[74] it is of a nonadversary,[75] fact-finding[76] character. It is a mere investigation[77] in which the board plays the part of a disinterested investigator,[78] and the employer is only a nominal party.[79]

§ 28(31). —— Pleadings

A petition filed by a labor union requesting that it be certified as the representative of certain employees raises the question as to the proper exclusive bargaining representative of the employees.

A petition filed with the labor relations board by a labor union requesting that it be certified as the representative of certain employees raises the question as to the proper exclusive bargaining representative of the employees.[80] A labor union need not make a showing that it represents a majority of the employees in order to be entitled to petition for certification as bargaining representative.[81] Under some statutes the board has no jurisdiction to entertain a petition for a certification that a certain union does not represent the employees.[82]

§ 28(32). —— Conduct of Proceedings; Notice

The inquiry as to the proper bargaining representative is to be conducted in accordance with such procedure as is prescribed by the labor relations statute but under some statutes there may be great latitude in procedural details. Where there is a dispute between different groups of employees as to which group represents the majority, notice of the investigation must be given to the employees concerned.

Public agency to effectuate statutory policy

In proceedings for certification of a bargaining agent, the National Labor Relations Board was not a tribunal for settlement and enforcement of private rights under a private contract between employer company and a union, but was acting as public agency for purpose of effectuating public policy of the National Labor Relations Act.—Sanford v. Number of employees represented

Where union's petition for determination of employees' representative by state labor relations board stated case belonging to general class within board's jurisdiction, and board had jurisdiction of parties, insufficiency, if any, of petition in that it did not show how many employees union claimed to represent did not render board's order for election void.—Hanley v. Boland, 33 N. Y.S.2d 673, 177 Misc. 973.

82. Pa.—In re G. C. Murphy Co., 51 Pa.Dist. & Co. 535—Petition of Koehler, Com.Pl., 92 Pittsb.Leg.J. 587.

The inquiry as to the proper bargaining representative is to be conducted in accordance with such procedure as is prescribed by the labor relations statute,[83] and a hearing is a prerequisite to the validity of any certification where the statute so provides.[84] The board may properly require documentary evidence of representation before it will conduct a hearing.[85] Where the statutory provisions for an election are permissive rather than mandatory, the hearing need not be held before the election,[86] and the fact that the hearing before the election has been inadequate is immaterial where an adequate hearing is given after the election.[87] The National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes contemplate great latitude in procedural details[88] and an investigation which is essentially informal.[89]

In determining whether a named union has been selected by the employees as their representative, the labor relations board is entitled to make its decision in the light of all the facts.[90] The board may determine in the proceedings whether a union is dominated by the employer[91] or it may refuse to rule on a request for certification until after a determination has been had as to whether the union is dominated by the employer.[92] Likewise the board may withhold its decision pending the outcome of unfair practice proceedings which might show that the selection by the employees may have been affected by unfair practices of the employer.[93] After the original hearing the board may properly hear additional evidence as to the continued affiliation of the majority of employees with the union[94] or, in its discretion, it may refuse to do so.[95]

By submitting evidence at a representation hearing the employer does not waive his right to have jurisdictional objections subsequently determined.[96]

Notice. Where there is a dispute between different groups of employees as to which group represents the majority, notice of the investigation must be given to the employees concerned.[97]

Effect of nonreviewable nature of determination

The fact that determination of question of employer's domination of union would not be reviewable if made in a representation proceeding, whereas it would be reviewable if decided in an unfair practice proceeding, did not furnish basis for ruling that the question could not be determined in representation proceeding, since order made in unfair practice proceeding is a final order, whereas order in representation proceeding is a mere interlocutory order in an administrative process.—Madden v. f. Determination of result
g. Operation and effect

a. In General

Under the various labor relations statutes, the labor relations board or other administrative agency may have the right or the duty to order an election in which the employees may express their choice of a bargaining representative.

As a general rule under the provisions of labor relations statutes, the labor relations board or other administrative agency may order an election in which the employees may express their choice of a bargaining representative.[98] Under some statutes the board must order an election where a question of representation exists,[99] but if no statutory requirement exists the board need not order an election.[1] In accordance with statutory provisions a petition for an election by a majority of employees[2] or a hearing in the investigation concerning representation[3] is not a condition precedent to the exercise of the power by the board, but it has been held, where the charge is made that the employer has favored one candidate with the purpose of influencing the employees to cast their votes for that candidate, that the board should investigate the charge before holding an election.[4] The fact that a mistake of fact causes the board to order an election does not render the order void.[5] It has been held that the board has no power to order an election where a collective bargaining agreement conforming to the labor relations statute has recently been signed[6] or where no representation controversy exists,[7] and, if the state labor relations board has no power under the state statute to determine which of two labor organizations affiliated with the same parent labor organization has the right to represent the employees, the board has no power to direct an election for the purpose of deciding such question.[8]

Reasonable notice of the election and the candidates to be voted on must be given.[9]

The board is not bound by its previous construction of the statutory provision for elections where

Number signing authorization cards

Where record showed that the National Mediation Board, when it ordered a representation election, had before it the number and not the names of persons who had signed authorization cards, the board could decide that a dispute existed, and it could treat the names of the signers as immaterial.—National Federation of Railway Workers v. National Mediation Board, 110 F.2d 529, 71 App.D.C. 266, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 975, 310 U.S. 628, 84 L.Ed. 1399.

Notice to official of labor organization

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, notice of a representation election to a proper official of contending labor organization is sufficient.—National Federation of Railway Workers v. National Mediation Board, 110 F.2d 529, 71 App.D.C. 266, certiorari denied 60 S. Ct. 975, 310 U.S. 628, 84 L.Ed. 1399.

a different construction has been adopted by the court.[10]

New election. Where the charge is made that the union which was formerly elected bargaining agent for the employees no longer represents the majority of the employees, the labor relations board has discretionary power to order or to refuse to order a new election.[11] The board is not required to order a new election merely because several years have elapsed since the last election[12] or because the employer's unfair labor practices may have adversely affected the majority status of the duly elected representative.[13]

The fact that the existing collective agreement requires all employees to be members of the union which is the bargaining agent of the employees does not preclude the holding of another election.[14]

b. Campaigning and Other Conduct before Election

Labor unions or individual employees may campaign before the election.

Labor unions[15] or individual employees[16] may campaign before the election, and the labor relations board has no authority to order them not to take part in the election campaign.[17] A union may employ peaceful picketing[18] or it may waive membership dues for a period of time[19] in order to gain votes in the forthcoming election.

An employer's action in distributing a mere statement of policy before the election is not of itself an interference with the right of employees freely to choose their bargaining representative.[20]

c. Eligibility to Vote

All persons who are employees in the bargaining unit at the time of the election are entitled to vote in the election.

All persons who are employees in the bargaining unit at the time of the election are entitled to vote in the election,[21] and persons who are not employees in the bargaining unit at the time of the election are not entitled to vote.[22] Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, the National Mediation Board has great discretion in determining eligibility for participation in the election,[23] but it should give a full hearing to those claiming eligibility to vote[24] and it should base its decision on evidence introduced at the hearing.[25]

Replacement of personnel

Where, as result of strike caused by employer's unfair labor practices, nearly all employees left employer's plant and were replaced by new personnel, a new election as to bargaining agency was not mandatory on ground of changed conditions, but that was a matter to be determined by National Labor Relations Board.—N. Altering rules of eligibility

The National Mediation Board in the exercise of its discretion may alter its ruling concerning eligibility after notice of election.—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Railway Employees' Department of American Federation of Labor, supra.

25. Information obtained through examiner

Refusal of National Mediation Board to inform emergency conductors who were excluded from election of class or craft representatives for collective bargaining of facts on which board based designation or rule as to eligibility for participation in election on ground that infor-

who are subject to recall are properly permitted to vote[26] unless they have obtained work with another employer.[27] Persons who have voluntarily terminated their employment during a strike are not eligible voters.[28] Apprentices who are minors and employed under contracts which required the consent of their guardians may be excluded from the election in the discretion of the board.[29]

The fact that votes are cast by ineligible voters does not invalidate the election where that fact has not affected the outcome of the election.[30]

d. Ballots

In accordance with statutory provisions, the labor relations board may properly direct which names shall go on the ballot.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, the labor relations board may properly direct which names shall go on the ballot,[31] and it may exclude from the ballot the name of an organization which is not free from employer control.[32]

e. Conduct of Election

In accordance with statutory provisions, the manner in which the election is to be conducted and the rules and regulations for the conduct of the election are within the discretion of the labor relations board, subject to the principles of majority rule and secrecy of the ballot.

As a general rule under labor relations statutes, the manner in which the election of the bargaining representative is to be conducted and the rules and regulations for the conduct of the election are within the discretion of the labor relations board,[33] subject to the principles of majority rule[34] and secrecy of the ballot.[35] A rule requiring the challenge of a person's right to vote to be made before the elec-mation was obtained through its examiner and should not be divulged was held improper, since nothing can be treated as evidence which is not introduced as such.—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. National Mediation Board, supra.

After order to disestablish association

Where the labor relations board, after ordering the company to disestablish completely a workers' association, ordered an election without provision for workers' association to be placed on ballot, a stay would not be granted on theory that board's action constituted an enforcement of its disestablishment order.—Utah Copper Co. v. Calling off election

The action of field examiner of National Labor Relations Board in calling off a bargaining agency election immediately before time set on ground that election would be influenced by wage increases recently granted was not to be commended, although control of elections is vested in labor board and not in the courts.—S. H. Camp & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 160 F.2d 519.

Interpretation and amendment of rules

National Mediation Board, in holding election to determine which of two brotherhoods should represent locomotive engineers employed by railroad, in negotiating with railroad's receivers, had authority to interpret its own rules and to amend or set them aside in its own discretion.—Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen v. Kenan, C.C.A.Fla., 87 F.2d 651, certiorari denied Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers v. Kenan, 57 S.Ct. 790, 301 U.S. 687, 81 L. Ed. 1344.

tion and not after is valid and reasonable.[36] The board has discretionary power to refuse to permit the employer, the union, or employees to be represented at the polls by observers[37] or to exclude the employer or his representatives from the place of the election.[38]

Run-off election. A run-off election limiting the choice between the two unions who have received the largest number of votes is proper as within the discretion of the board.[39] Where in the interim between an election and a run-off election there has been a large turn-over of employees and a considerable time has elapsed so that the run-off election is in legal contemplation a new election, it has been held improper for the board to limit the election to the two unions which previously received the largest number of votes.[40]

f. Determination of Result

As a general rule a majority of those voting in the election determines the choice of bargaining representative.

As a general rule a majority of those voting in the election determines the choice of bargaining representative[41] even though a majority of the employees has not participated in the election.[42] The real test in determining the validity of an election carried by a majority of a minority is whether the election is actually representative.[43] The principle of majority rule does not foreclose practical adjustments designed to protect the election machinery from abuse and fraud,[44] and the determination of whether in fact a majority voted for the union must be made in accordance with such formal rules of procedure as the labor relations board may find necessary to adopt in the sound exercise of its discretion.[45] The board must adopt rules which will provide for the recording of votes accurately, efficiently, and speedily.[46]

The board may properly refuse to count signed ballots,[47] ballots containing a cross in more than one square,[48] ballots cast by ineligible voters,[49] or ballots containing a write-in vote for an ineligible organization.[50] Blank ballots are not to be considered in determining the majority of votes cast.[51] Although a voter's intention is not apparent from the face of the ballot, he should not be permitted to testify as to his intention.[52]

Contest. Where a recount of the ballots by the court supports the original return, an attempt to impeach the election return will fail.[53] Affidavits and depositions to show how certain employees vot-

Effect of possible error

Even if the National Mediation Board committed an error in permitting a certain person to act as election observer for a labor organization this would not justify nullifying election fairly and honestly conducted.—National Federation of Railway Workers v. ed are not competent as evidence to impeach the ballots.[54]

Where an improper exclusion of votes cast does not affect the result of the election, the union for which the votes were cast may not complain.[55] After votes have been rejected on the objection of a union, the union is in no position to assert impropriety in their rejection.[56]

g. Operation and Effect

As a general rule an election determines the right of representation, but, when circumstances warrant, the labor relations board may disregard the results of the election.

Generally an election expresses the desires of the employees concerning their choice of a bargaining representative[57] and it determines the right of representation.[58] The election is binding on the participating parties[59] and a subsequent repudiation of the results of the election by the employees does not destroy its effect.[60] However, when circumstances warrant, the labor relations board may disregard the results of the election,[61] such as where it finds that interference by the employer has affected the results of the election[62] or that the organization which won the election is dominated by the employer.[63] The fact that the board has ordered or supervised an election does not operate as an estoppel against it to inquire into the validity of a labor organization[64] or to investigate unfair labor practices which have benefited the organization which won the election.[65] Where the statute does not require the bargaining representative to be determined by an election, the administrative agency, after it has set aside the election, may adopt any other suitable method to ascertain the proper representative.[66]

29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, a certification is not an order but is merely the certification of a fact,[68] and likewise under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, the National Mediation Board makes no order and its only ultimate finding of fact is the certificate to which congress has added a command enforceable by judicial decree.[69] A certificate which complies with the statute is sufficient.[70]

The fact that a representative is not certified until a considerable period of time has elapsed from the date of the election is not a ground for invalidating the certification if no showing of a loss of majority by the certified representative is made.[71] Where the statute specifying the period of time within which certification is to be made is merely directory, failure of the board to make certification within that time does not render the certification invalid.[72]

If certification has been induced by fraud the board has sole jurisdiction to amend, modify, or vacate the order.[73]

power later to declare the union to be company dominated and to order its disestablishment.[79] The dismissal of a prior application of a union to represent all of the employees does not bar subsequent proceedings resulting in the determination that a smaller number in a certain department constitutes an appropriate unit.[80] Where a union whose request to be recognized as bargaining agent is refused because of an order of the board requiring the employer to bargain with another union, the union is in the same position after the order has been held improper by a reviewing court as though the order had not been issued.[81]

The successful union is not required to negotiate with the employer immediately after it has been certified as bargaining agent, and a delay does not justify the employer's refusal to bargain with it thereafter.[82]

Certification as affecting the duration of the authority of the bargaining representative is considered infra § 28 (36).

§ 28(35). Extent of Authority and Duties of Representative

a. In general

b. Grievances and individual claims

a. In General

Under labor relations statutes the collective bargaining representative has the exclusive authority to represent all the employees in the unit for purposes of collective bargaining, and it must act fairly and impartially on behalf of all members of the unit.

Under labor relations statutes the representative chosen by the majority of the employees in the bargaining unit has the exclusive authority to represent all the employees in the unit for purposes of collective bargaining,[83] whether or not all the employees are members of the union which is the representative;[84] and a minority union has no authority to represent its members in negotiations with the employer.[85] The representative has whatever pow-

Discharges under closed-shop agreement

Use of closed-shop agreement by union with acquiescence of employer to obtain discharge of employees because of previous activities in behalf of opposing union justified inquiry by labor relations board into early history of union's organization with assistance of supervisory employees to determine whether it was fit bargaining agency, even though meantime elected as such by election of employees and certified by board.—Wallace Corporation v. Seniority rights

The power to contract with reference to seniority rights of nonunion employee exists only in exclusive bargaining agent as long as the agent acts within the law, and court is not empowered to contract for nonunion employee or to make a new contract.—Hess v. er is necessary fully to perform its functions,[86] and it is authorized to make contracts and agreements which are binding on all employees of the bargaining unit[87] and to modify such agreements,[88] but ordinarily it is the agent of the employees only for the limited purpose of securing for them fair and just wages and good working conditions[89] and it has no power to surrender personal rights of the employees.[90]

Where the employer deals with the representative of the employees he may assume that the representative is acting with full authority and that agreements with him are valid,[91] and after a contract has been entered into between the union and employer the court may not determine whether the procedure agreed on among members with respect to specific authority of the bargaining agent has been followed.[92] A union is not an agent of a nonmember employee for purposes other than collective bargaining.[93] The same organization may represent different groups of employees as long as their interests do not conflict.[94]

The representative must act fairly and impartially[95] on behalf of all members of the bargaining unit,[96] the majority as well as the minority,[97] regardless of union affiliations or want of them,[98] and the representative is without power to discriminate against employees in the unit on the ground of race or color[99] even though the discrimination purports

Fulfillment of purpose of statute

The declared purposes of the Railway Labor Act to avoid any interruption to commerce or to the operation of any carrier engaged therein by means of the prompt and orderly settlement of all disputes concerning rates of pay, rules, or working conditions could hardly be attained if a substantial minority of a craft were denied the right to have their interests considered at the conference table and if the final result of the bargaining process were to be the sacrifice of the rights of the minority by the action of a representative chosen by the majority.—Steele v. Louisville & N. R. Co., supra.

Consideration of requests and opportunity for hearing

The union must consider requests of nonunion members of the craft and expressions of their views with respect to collective bargaining with the employer and give them notice of, and opportunity for, hearing on its proposed action.—Steele v. Louisville & N. R. Co., Ala., 65 S.Ct. 226, 323 U.S. 192, 89 L.Ed. 173.

Seniority

The union which is the bargaining agent for the employees owes the same duty to protect the seniority rights of nonmembers of the union as it does the members of the union.—Griffin v. Gulf & S. I. R. Co., 21 So.2d 814, 198 Miss. 458.

to be based on another ground.[1] However, the representative is not barred from making contracts which may have unfavorable effects on some employees in the unit,[2] and variations in the terms of the contract based on differences relevant to the authorized purposes of the contract in conditions to which they are to be applied, such as differences in seniority, the type of work performed, and competence and skill in the performance of work, are within the scope of the representative's authority.[3]

b. Grievances and Individual Claims

In accordance with statutory provisions, the collective bargaining agent does not have the exclusive right to handle grievances unless they involve collective bargaining or an interpretation of the collective agreement.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, the collective bargaining agent does not have the exclusive right to handle grievances unless they involve collective bargaining or an interpretation of the collective agreement,[4] although he has the right to attend the hearing to safeguard the collective bargain[5] if he has not waived this right.[6] Individual employees or groups of employees may negotiate with the employer concerning grievances,[7] and an inexperienced employee may be assisted in presenting his grievance by a more experienced friend,[8] but an employee may not present a grievance through a union other than the one which is the collective bargaining agent.[9]

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, the bargaining agent does not have exclusive authority, in the absence of authorization over and above that given by the statute, to settle grievances of individual employees[10] or to settle claims of individual employees for damages caused by the employer's breach of contract.[11] The employee may conduct negotiations for the settlement of his individual claim or grievance either personally[12] or through a chosen representative[13] which may or may not be a labor organization,[14] and he may choose a labor organization which is not the collective bargaining agent.[15] The mere making of a complaint by a railroad employee through the union does not as a matter of law amount to final authorization to settle the claim,[16] but custom and practice in the railroad world may be adequate as a basis of authority for the union to settle the claim or

1. Nonpromotability

Brotherhood, which was collective bargaining agent for both firemen who were members and negro firemen who were not members, was not authorized to enter into a contract with railroad which sacrificed seniority and other rights of negro firemen, merely because the contract purported to base the discrimination on nonpromotability of firemen to eningeers, where the nonpromotability was itself based on race.—Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen v. The employees' designation of their bargaining representative, or an order or decree requiring the employer to bargain with the designated representative, does not grant a permanent status; the status of the designated representative continues until it is terminated in some legally effective manner.

The employees' designation of their bargaining representative or an order or decree requiring the employer to bargain with the designated representative, does not grant a permanent status,[19] and the employees have the right to revoke the designation;[20] the status of the designated representative continues until it is terminated in some legally effective manner.[21] There must be some measure of permanence in the choice of a bargaining representative,[22] and, unless extraordinary circumstances intervene, the certification of a union as the bargaining representative is effective for a reasonable period of time after its issuance,[23] regardless of the fact that conditions may have materially changed after the certification.[24] The labor relations board may determine whether the period of time is sufficient[25] or whether changed conditions invalidate an

Automatic extension of agreement

Where collective bargaining agreement between company and labor union provided that agreement should be automatically renewed for another period of three years unless either party should notify other party at least ninety days before expiration of the then current term that it elected to terminate the agreement, and rival labor union did not petition for an election to determine appropriate representative of employees until after expiration of period during which notice to terminate agreement might have been given, employees in effect made choice that union which signed agreement was to be their representative for next three years or until another representative was chosen, and such union continued as exclusive bargaining agent.—Triboro Coach Corporation v. New York State Labor Relations Board, 36 N.E.2d 315, 286 N.Y. 314, 144 A.L.R. 410, motion denied 39 N.E.2d 276, 287 N.Y. 647, 144 A.L.R. 410.

Presumption arises that organization chosen by election continues to represent unit, but such presumption may be rebutted.

Discretion to order new election see supra § 28 (33) a.

Extent of discretion

Provision of state labor relations act authorizing state board to determine the life of service of representatives selected for purposes of collective bargaining does not commit to the board an undefined discretion to permit employees to change bargaining representatives for any rea-

existing certification.[26]

After a considerable period of time has elapsed since the certification, the employees may seek in a proper proceeding certification of another bargaining agent,[27] and the labor relations board may in a proper proceeding take steps in recognition of changed situations which make appropriate changed bargaining relationships.[28] The labor relations board should on request make a new determination as to whether the bargaining representative continues to be the choice of the majority of employees,[29] and where the employees' revocation is freely and voluntarily made it must be respected by the board[30] even though the revocation is joined in by employees formerly connected with a dominated organization.[31] An employee must give direct expression of his desire to revoke the right of the union to represent him,[32] and an employee's failure to pay union dues[33] or his return to work even though a strike has been called by the union[34] does not of itself indicate a genuine desire to be unrepresented by the union. Where employees join another union after the expiration of the collective bargaining agreement, the authority of the union which negotiated the agreement is ended.[35]

Where a revocation is not freely and voluntarily made, the authority of the bargaining representative continues.[36]

A change in business by the employer does not operate to terminate the authority of the bargaining agent to represent the employees.[37]

b. Loss of Majority

Generally, after a union is shown to be no longer the choice of the majority of employees, it no longer possesses the authority to represent the employees for collective bargaining purposes; but where the union's loss of majority has been caused by unfair labor practices of the employer the status of the union as bargaining representative is not thereby terminated.

Generally, after a union is shown to be no longer the choice of the majority of the employees, it no longer possesses the authority to represent the employees for collective bargaining purposes.[38] An employer acting in good faith may properly change the personnel even though the union's majority is thereby reduced,[39] and where, by reason of valid discharges by the employer, the union's majority has been dissipated the union is no longer in a position to demand collective bargaining on behalf of the employees.[40]

An employer may not discredit a bargaining agent by a refusal to bargain and then take advantage of the resulting loss of membership as an excuse for refusal to recognize it as bargaining agent.[41] Where the union's loss of a majority has been caused by unfair labor practices of the employer, the status of the union as bargaining agent for the employees is not thereby terminated,[42] and the labor relations board may properly direct the employer to bargain collectively with the union.[43]

§ 28(37). Collective Bargaining Contracts

A collective bargaining agreement represents an accord between the employer and the bargaining representative of the employees as to terms which will govern hiring and work and pay. Ordinarily, it refers to general terms of employment rather than contracts of actual engagement or hiring.

A collective bargaining agreement represents an accord between the employer and the bargaining representative of the employees as to terms which will govern hiring and work and pay,[44] and it is not ipso facto invalid[45] as against ordinary claims of lack of consideration or want of mutuality.[46] Ordinarily, the term refers to general terms of employment rather than contracts of actual engagement or hiring,[47] and the accord is in the nature of a trade agreement rather than a contract of employment,[48] but there may be collective bargaining of actual individual employments.[49] A collective bargaining agreement is the joint and several contract of the members of the union made by the officers of the union as their agents,[50] but a union representing the employees may also be considered as a principal of the contract.[51] An employee is not entitled to notice of the negotiation of a collective bargaining contract by his representative.[52]

As a general rule, the labor relations board, or other administrative agency created by labor relations statutes, cannot make collective bargaining contracts or prescribe what shall be written in them,[53] and it has no equitable powers to reform a contract made under its supervision.[54] Likewise, the court has no power to make a contract for the parties.[55]

A legally called and properly conducted strike does not constitute duress enabling the employer to repudiate or avoid an agreement entered into in settlement of the strike,[56] even though the strike is called at the height of the employer's busy season.[57] The fact that a contract is made with a labor organization during the pendency of proceedings to restrain the employer from exerting pressure on the employees to join the organization does not render the contract invalid.[58]

An agreement may be modified by shortening the time for the termination of the agreement.[59] The practice of antedating contracts between the employer and the labor organization is inappropriate to a fair and proper administration of the National Labor Relations Act.[60]

The principle, that a party contemplating rescission must elect between that remedy and the course of pursuing his contract rights, applies to collective bargaining agreements,[61] and, where an employer operates under a collective bargaining contract for a considerable period of time before attempting to repudiate it for duress, he thereby ratifies the contract and loses the right to avoid it.[62]

An employer is entitled to demand a contract from the union which will permit the employer to do business at a profit.[63]

"Voluntary agreement." A contract negotiated with unorganized workers is not a "voluntary agreement" within some labor relations statutes,[64] but the term "voluntary agreement" means an agreement which is negotiated by representatives of the employees chosen without interference, restraint, or coercion on the part of the employer.[65]

Contract with improper representative. A contract entered into by an employer with an uncertified union which professes to represent the majority of the employees, but in fact does not represent them, has been held not to be a valid collective contract under the labor relations statute,[66] and, likewise, a contract with an employer dominated union is invalid under such statutes.[67]

§ 28(38). —— Duty to Enter into Contract

As a general rule, the labor relations statutes do not compel the employer or the employees to enter into a contract or agreement under the collective bargaining process, but they contemplate that contracts or agreements will be reached as a result of collective bargaining.

As a general rule, the labor relations statutes do not compel the employer or the employees to enter into a contract or agreement under the collective bargaining process,[68] or to agree in all particulars,[69] but the objective of such statutes is the making of contracts between employers and labor organizations,[70] and they contemplate that contracts or agreements will be reached as a result of collective bargaining.[71]

§ 28(39). —— Form of Contract; Signature

Generally, once an agreement has been reached between the employer and the representative of the employees, a good faith compliance with the collective bargaining provisions of labor relations statutes requires that the agreement be reduced to writing. The agreement need not be signed by each individual employee.

Generally, once an agreement has been reached between the employer and the representative of the employees, a good faith compliance with the collective bargaining provisions of labor relations statutes requires that the agreement be reduced to writing,[72] and the employer is not free to refuse to embody the agreement in a signed contract.[73] A statement by the employer that he will not sign a written contract with the employees' representative constitutes a refusal to bargain collectively,[74] even though at the time of the statement no understanding as to the terms of the agreement has been reached.[75] The purpose of a written agreement is to provide a statement of principles and rules for the orderly government of the employer-employee relationship in the future.[76]

The contract need not be signed by each individual employee.[77] An agreement between an association of employers and a labor organization need not be signed by the individual members of the association,[78] and a contract provision stating that it must be so signed may be waived where the parties recognize the validity of the contract and fully perform their obligations under it for a considerable period of time.[79]

§ 28(40). —— Validity or Propriety of Terms

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, no particular terms need be included in the collective bargaining contract. A closed-shop or a union-shop provision may be included in the contract unless such a provision is prohibited by statute.

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, no particular terms or provisions need be included in the collective bargaining contract between the employer and the employees,[80] but, where the employer is a public utility, it has been held that both the union and the employer must take into account the reasonable needs of the public.[81] Various provisions in collective bargaining contracts have been held to be valid,[82] including provisions for seniority rights,[83] provisions respecting the number of men to be employed,[84] provisions which prohibit the employer from using materials made up by nonunion labor,[85] provisions which prohibit the employer from giving work to a firm which employs nonunion labor,[86] provisions which give the union the right to call a strike in order to prevent the employer from doing work for another against whom a strike is pending,[87] and provisions in which the employees surrender the right to strike.[88] Provisions for arbitration of disputes have been held to be valid,[89] but they have also been held to be in-

Statute invalidating promise to join labor organization

The statutory provision, declaring employee's promise "to join or to remain a member of a labor organization" contrary to public policy, does not prohibit promise to join independent labor union, although term "labor organization," taken by itself, is broad enough to refer to either company union or independent union, as purpose of statute containing such provision was to prohibit company unions and interference by employers with collective bargaining by employees.—Shafer v. Statute prohibiting intimidation

Where labor union, acting within the scope of its authority, executed a closed-shop agreement with manufacturing association, the certified union's solicitation to nonmembers to become members of union in order to continue their employment was within the permissible area of economic conflict and did not violate statute prohibiting use of intimidation or force to prevent a person from entering into or continuing in the employment of any person.—Hamer v. Men subsequently employed

(1) Contract between employer and labor organization, requiring as a condition of employment membership in the organization with respect to all men subsequently employed was valid.—N. L. R. B. v. Electric Vacuum Cleaner Co., C.C.A. 6, 120 F.2d 611, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 846, 315 U.S. 685, 86 L.Ed. 1120, rehearing denied 62 S.Ct. 1038, 316 U.S. 708, 86 L.Ed. 1775.

(2) Provision of contract between employer and labor organization exempting from requirement of union membership older employees whose held to be valid, but such a contract has also been held to be illegal.[97] Closed-shop contracts, as affected by public policy, are considered in Contracts § 267.

Where the validity of such an agreement is upheld, an employer may properly agree to a closed shop[98] or union shop,[99] and, where the employees are not members of, or represented by, any collective bargaining agency, the employer may agree with an outside union to operate a union shop.[1] The provision of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (3), that nothing in the act or any other statute of the United States shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization requiring membership therein as a condition of employment, at least prior to the amendment of such statute, was held not to confer authority to enter into a closed-shop agreement but merely to remove what otherwise might be considered restrictions on such an agreement.[2] In considering the question whether a closed-shop agreement in a war industry in time of war hinders the war effort and should not be upheld, the operation of the agreement must be viewed as a whole.[3]

In order that a closed-shop or union-shop agreement may be valid under some labor relations statutes, the labor organization must be one which is not established, maintained, or assisted by any unfair labor practice, and one which is the representative of a majority of employees in the unit when the agreement is made.[4] Thus, a closed-shop or union-shop agreement with a union assisted or dominated by the employer,[5] or with an uncertified union which does not represent the majority of employees in the appropriate bargaining unit,[6] is invalid, but, if the union properly represents the employees, the agreement is not invalidated by the fact that the union has not been certified by the labor relations board.[7] The employer has the legal duty to reject the demands for a closed-shop by a union which does not represent the majority of the employees in the bargaining unit.[8] The fact that a majority of employees are members of a labor organization does not authorize the organization to make a closed-shop agreement unless it is authorized to engage in collective bargaining.[9] The labor relations board has the power to determine the right of the union to bind all of the employees to a closed-shop or union-shop contract.[10] An employer is not required to enter into a closed-shop agreement under which the employer knows that discriminatory discharges of employees who were members of another union are bound to occur.[11]

A provision that the union will not, in future negotiations, demand a closed-shop, where a closed-shop is authorized by statute, has been held to be invalid.[12]

a. In General

Generally, a collective bargaining contract is subject to the same rules of interpretation as other contracts. The contract creates enforceable rights and is binding on both parties.

Generally, a collective bargaining contract between employers and employees is subject to the same rules of interpretation as other contracts.[13] The contract should be realistically construed,[14] and it should be broadly construed so as to accomplish its evident aims.[15] The court, in construing the agreement, must endeavor to ascertain the substantial intent of the parties as expressed by the language employed by them,[16] and the construction of the contract by the parties themselves should be

The fact that a contract as to services of a certain class of employees was negotiated between a railroad company and an organization representing a part of such class does not exclude others of that class, not members of the organization, from its benefits, when the nonmembers and the company recognized and treated it as the contract under which their services were rendered and accepted.—Gregg v. Contract not seen by employee

The collective bargaining contract is binding on an employee, although he has not seen the contract.—Earle Restaurant v. O'Meara, D.C., 160 F. 2d 275.

Jobbers

The mere fact that in some instances jobbers delivering products of bakeries might be corporations or partnerships did not prevent the individuals performing the labor for the jobbers from being bound by a

has been held that, where collective bargaining is not provided for by statute, individual members of a labor union are not bound by a contract between the union and the employer unless they ratify the contract as individuals.[25]

An individual employee is entitled to the benefits of the agreement,[26] even if on his own he would agree to less favorable terms,[27] unless he is not within the class of employees covered by the agreement,[28] but it has also been held that, where the agreement is not a part of the contract of employment, no rights accrue under it to the employee which he may enforce against the employer.[29] Ordinarily, a collective bargaining agreement does not operate to fix the term of employment,[30] or bind the individual employees to serve for any definite time;[31] nor does it require the employer to continue in business for the period of the contract.[32] The effect of a collective bargaining agreement on individual employee contracts is considered infra § 28 (42).

A maintenance of membership provision which requires that members of the union must remain members of the union in good standing or be subject to discharge from the employment does not create a closed shop, a union shop, or a preferential union shop.[33]

Antedated contract. The fact that a contract is antedated does not permit it to operate retroactively as far as the rights of third persons are affected,[34] and, accordingly, it does not legalize discharges of employees outside the organization and other aid given to the organization when no contract actually existed.[35]

Invalid contract. A contract with an unfairly favored union does not bar the necessity for bargaining with the exclusive bargaining representative.[36] Where the bargaining agent negotiating the agreement is not the proper representative of a group of employees, all the terms of the agreement, in so far as they pertain to that group of employees, are unenforceable.[37] The employer is not bound by, or entitled to the benefit of, a contract prohibited by statute.[38]

Duration and termination. The rights and duties under the collective bargaining agreement continue collective agreement between the union and the bakeries.—Bernstein v. Madison Baking Co., 38 N.Y.S.2d 811, 186 Misc. 474.

Repudiation by subsequent representative

as long as the agreement remains in force.[39] The agreement does not create a permanent status, give an indefinite tenure, or extend rights created and arising under the agreement beyond its life where it has been terminated in accordance with its provisions.[40] Where an employer observes the condition of employment provided in an agreement between it and a labor union after expiration of the agreement, as a matter of practice and not of agreement, there is no implied contract to continue observing such conditions.[41]

Where the agreement provides for automatic renewal or extension in the absence of notice before the expiration of the agreement,[42] or where it permits abrogation of the agreement a certain period of time after notice,[43] the notice must be given substantially in conformity with the terms of the agreement in order to be valid and effective. Notice of termination by the secretary of the union is not binding unless the secretary is fully authorized to give such notice.[44]

The suspension of the charter of a local union by the national union may constitute a failure of consideration terminating the employer's obligation under the collective bargaining agreement where the parties have contemplated continued affiliation with the national union,[45] but such suspension does not constitute a failure of consideration where the parties have not contemplated affiliation with the national union and the local union is engaged in business independently of the national union.[46]

Performance or breach; waiver. Where the employer without justification states that he will be bound no longer by the contract, the union may disregard the anticipatory breach and may wait until an affirmative act in breach of the contract occurs.[47] A trivial breach of the agreement by one party does not justify nonperformance of the agreement by the other,[48] and the failure of the employer to adhere strictly to the terms of the contract may be excused, where such action is caused by a national emergency.[49] A strike by union members, even though it is without the approval of union officials, may be a breach of an agreement not to strike,[50] but an unauthorized strike by union members is not a breach of an agreement which provides that no strike shall be ordered or enforced by the union.[51] An implied agreement not to lock out the employees is operative only if the employees fulfill their obligation not to strike.[52] A union contracting with an employer to furnish him union labor is entitled, at the termination of the contract when the union members cease work, to take the union stamp previously supplied the employer's shop.[53]

The terms of the contract may be waived by the parties.[54]

Termination of business

(1) Provision of contract between union and its members and corporate employer that employees who had been continuously employed for a year or more should receive a week's vacation between May and September did not entitle employees to vacation after employer's place of business was in effect destroyed by fire and the business had come to an end where the contract was made on the assumption that the business would continue.—Reid & Yeomans v. Drug Store Employees Union, 29 N.Y.S.2d 835.

b. Arbitration

Provisions for arbitration in a collective bargaining contract are to be treated the same as such provisions in any other contract, and, if valid, they are binding on the parties.

Provisions for arbitration in a collective bargaining contract are to be treated the same as such provisions in any other contract,[55] and such provisions, if valid, are binding on the parties.[56] A contract written by an arbitrator appointed by the parties is as enforceable as though all parties actually signed it.[57]

c. Closed Shop or Union Shop

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, a closed-shop contract or union-shop contract entered into by an employer with the appropriate bargaining representative of the employees is binding and enforceable, and discharges made in accordance with its provisions are proper.

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, a closed-shop contract[58] or a union-shop contract[59] entered into by an employer with the appropriate bargaining representative of the employees has been held to be binding and enforceable. Discharges of nonunion employees in accordance with a closed-shop or union-shop agreement with the valid bargaining agency are proper[60] and are necessitated by the agreement,[61] but discharges under such an agreement with a company-dominated union are a violation of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes.[62] If the

Maintenance of membership or union shop

Contract between employer and labor organization whereby all employees were to maintain membership in labor organization, present employees were to be accepted into membership, and all new employees were to become members of organization, and employer agreed, on demand, to discharge any employee who refused to maintain membership, was not a mere "maintenance of membership contract," but was a "union-shop contract" which authorized the employer to discharge employees in compliance with the contract.—Markham & Callow v. International Woodworkers of America, Lumber & Sawmill Workers Union, 135 P.2d 727, 170 Or. 517.

Notice from union

Ordinarily, in absence of judicial proceeding, employer in enforcing closed-shop agreement need not look behind notice from labor union that a particular employee is not a member in good standing.—James v. Marinship Corp., 155 P.2d 329, 25 Cal.2d 721, 160 A.L.R. 900.

contract properly construed is not a valid closed-shop or union-shop contract, the employer has no right to discharge an employee for membership in another union.[63]

A closed-shop contract carries with it certain responsibilities in which the public has an interest to prevent abuse,[64] and it is the duty of the courts to be vigilant to safeguard such rights as the individual employee retains and to protect them from infringement.[65] The provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes do not give a union the authority to maintain a closed-shop agreement with an arbitrarily closed-union membership,[66] and they constitute no authority for the successful union to deny membership to employees who supported the opposing union, and to have them discharged, where the employees are willing to join the successful union,[67] since such a construction would deny to workers the full freedom of association and self-organization which is the prime purpose of such statutes.[68]

A contract provision which requires new employees to join the union has been held not to oblige the union to admit all new employees to membership.[69]

d. Discharge and Layoff

The existence of a collective bargaining agreement between the employer and the employees does not of itself deprive the employer of the right to discharge or lay off an employee, but express terms of the agreement may regulate or restrict the right.

The fact that a collective bargaining agreement between the employer and the employees is in existence does not of itself deprive the employer of the right to discharge or lay off an employee,[70] particularly where the agreement expressly reserves the right to the employer,[71] but express terms of the agreement may regulate or restrict the right,[72] such as by depriving the employer of the right to discharge employees for certain reasons,[73] or by imposing the duty on the employer to discharge employees for specified causes.[74] A collective agreement frequently includes provisions that an employee shall not be discharged without just cause or without a hearing, or similar provisions, and it is generally held that such provisions are binding on the employer,[75] but there is other authority which holds that they are not binding since an employee has no reciprocal obligation to continue in the employ.[76] The hearing, where the agreement is binding, must be conducted within the period of time[77] and in the manner[78] prescribed or contemplated by the agreement. The employee must request a hearing or investigation where the contract so provides,[79] but in the absence of such provision it is not necessary for the employee to do so.[80]

(1) Where collective bargaining agreement provided that bus operators should not be discharged without fair investigation, and required complainant to be present at hearing, discharge of bus operator on sole ground that spotter employed by an independent investigating company had reported operator's failure to report fares, without producing spotter so that operator could confront or examine him, was improper.—Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Hill Bus Co., 44 A.2d 904, 137 N.J.Eq. 408.

(2) Failure to produce spotter at hearing was not excusable on ground that the spotter who reported operator was an employee of another company and that, if he were produced, his usefulness would be ended.—Brotherhood of R. R. Trainmen v. Hill Bus Co., 51 A.2d 116, 139 N. J.Eq. 304.

(3) Where unions expressly demanded the right of confronting spotter on basis of whose report bus operator was discharged, failure to insist on production of spotter in previous instances did not excuse dismissal of operator without producing spotter.—Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Hill Bus Co., supra.

Failure to object

In action against railroad by former engine foreman for wrongful discharge, on ground that he did not have a fair hearing, foreman was not precluded from recovering because foreman made no objection at hearing at which he was discharged, that the hearing was conducted by one who was not fair and impartial, where there was nothing to show that any objection in that respect would have been effective, and there was nothing in railroad's rules indicating that the foreman had the right to object to the one holding the hearing.—Butner v. Union Pac. R. Co., 163 S.W.2d 100, 236 Mo.App. 1134.

79. Substantial compliance

Discharged railroad section foreman's letter asking immediate superior to investigate why company was acting as it had and to write foreman letter was held substantial compliance with union contract making request for an investigation a prerequisite to a hearing.—Youmans v. Business conditions causing discharges or layoffs

(1) Where original agreement between railroads and labor union did not expressly require railroads to return to their service yardmen let out in a reduction of forces, but provided for an investigation and hearing for any yardman taken out of service or censured for cause, the provision for investigation and trial did not limit right of railroads to reduce their forces as and when required by the state of their business.—Earle v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 167 S.W.2d 15, 25 Tenn.App. 660, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 161, 317 U.S. 680, 87 L.Ed. 546.

(2) Provision in union contract for one week's notice of intended layoffs applied to temporary layoffs due to slack work and to the closing of a store in the chain operated by employer, but did not apply to closing of entire business of chain and liquidation in legal proceedings pursuant to court order.—In re Willow Cafeterias, D.C.N.Y., 71 F.Supp. 685.

(3) Suspension of operations because of an unfavorable market is not within a provision prohibiting the closing of the plant because of a dispute between the employer and the employees.—Cross Mountain Coal Co. v. Ault, 9 S.W.2d 692, 157 Tenn. 461.

Discharge for use of intoxicants

Under contract between railway and order of railway conductors authorizing railway to discharge conductors without investigation only in cases of intoxication, and railway rule prohibiting use of intoxicants, railway did not breach contract when it discharged conductor without investigation for being under influence of an intoxicant when he reported for work, although he was not intoxicated, where parties construed contract as authorizing railway to discharge conductors without investigation for any use of liquor, and conductor discharged had sought reinstatement on a leniency basis.—Robertson v. Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W. 2d 1078, error dismissed.

Discharge for physical disability

A provision in contract between railroad and union that conductors should not be disciplined or discharged without just cause and that accused should be given ten days' notice related only to disciplinary action and did not prevent railroad from discharging a conductor for physical disability, except on ten days' notice, since the word "discharge" could not be taken from its respect of employees covered by the agreement.[82] In order to constitute a discharge of a person protected by a union contract there must be an intent on the part of the employer to terminate the employment,[83] and there must be some affirmative action taken by the employer which will communicate the intent to the employee.[84] Failure to call a laid-off employee back to work in the order required by seniority provisions of the contract is not necessarily a discharge,[85] but a refusal by an employer, when requested, to take back an employee after work is available for him may constitute a discharge within a provision restricting the employer's right to discharge.[86]

e. Seniority Rights

In the absence of a statute governing the matter of seniority rights of employees, where seniority rights are provided for in a collective bargaining agreement, the seniority rights of an individual employee arise only from the agreement, and their extent and limitation depend on the terms of the agreement.

"Seniority," as the term is used in collective bargaining agreements, is the right of employees to certain preferential treatment based on their length of service.[87] It is in a sense a reward for length of service combined with capacity of performance;[88] it is in effect unemployment insurance which the worker has purchased by his years of faithful service,[89] and essentially it is as much a part of an employee's wages as though he received an increase therein and used the increase to buy such insurance.[90] Seniority begins when an employee's pay begins and continues as long as he is in the service of the employer regardless of whether he is laid off, on vacation, or, under the terms of the Selective Service Act, in military service.[91]

In accordance with the rule that an employee has no inherent right to seniority, as discussed supra § 5, in the absence of a statute governing the matter, where seniority rights are provided for in a collective bargaining agreement, the seniority rights of an individual employee arise only from the agreement,[92] and their extent and limitation depend on the terms of the agreement,[93] including union context and was subject to the rule of "ejusdem generis."—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wells, 160 S.W.2d 16, 289 Ky. 700.

Prohibition of discharge for striking

Provision in agreement between striking employees and employer, providing, that no striking employee would be discharged during an eight months' period for his participation in the strike, did not bind employer to retain any particular employees for any length of time, since such provision contemplated only that no employee would be discharged because of his participation in the strike.—Smith v. Right to work

Seniority represents in the highest degree the right to work, and by seniority the oldest man, in point of service, ability, and fitness for the job being sufficient, is given choice of jobs, is first promoted within range of jobs subject to seniority, and is the last laid off, proceeding so on down the line to the youngest in point of service.—Dooley v. regulations which are referred to, or made a part of, the agreement,[94] even though the employee is not a member of the union.[95]

Provisions for seniority rights should be interpreted in accordance with established canons of construction of contracts generally,[96] and the understanding of the parties as to the meaning of the agreement should be considered.[97] The provisions should be construed in an objective manner,[98] in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the nature of the operations contemplated and regulated thereby, and the objects sought to be accomplished.[99] The motives of the parties in insisting on their rights under the contract are not to be considered.[1] A supplemental agreement should be construed with the original agreement.[2]

(2) Where telegraph operator under contract between his labor union and railroad had seniority rights entitling him to a position, if he was qualified and there was nothing to show that railroad's superintendent who customarily passed on employees' qualifications in the first instance acted arbitrarily or in bad faith in deciding that operator was not qualified, operator was not entitled to the position, and he could not predicate breach of contract on the permitted exercise of the superintendent's discretion.—Steadman v. Constructive knowledge of interpretation

Where agreement between labor union and railroads obligated railroads to return to the service yardmen, let out in reduction of forces, in order of their seniority standing if yardmen were not out of the service to exceed six months and understanding of railroads' construction of agreement was widespread and notorious among the employees whose interests were directly affected by the agreement, and local officials of the railroads, and the practice thereunder was uniform, yardman suing for breach of such obligation was chargeable with constructive knowledge of the meaning attributed to the agreement.—Earle v. Modification and termination of rights. Seniority rights may be taken away or modified by subsequent agreements properly entered into by the bargaining agent and the employer.[9] Where an employee separates from the service of the employer,[10] or, after being laid off temporarily, fails to comply with the regulations prescribed by the agreement to preserve his seniority rights,[11] or transfers to another department or division which, under the terms of the agreement, has a separate seniority roster,[12] his seniority rights under the original employment are terminated.

dividual hirings.[14] The labor relations statutes do not prohibit an employer from making individual contracts with his employees,[15] or prohibit an employee from making an individual contract with the employer,[16] and such statutes do not preclude an employer from conducting his business on an open-shop basis;[17] but he may not insert in the contract of employment any discriminatory term which encourages or discourages membership in a labor organization other than requiring membership in the labor organization which has been legally chosen to represent the employees.[18] Conditions of employment which are not covered or provided for by the collective agreement may be fixed by the employer,[19] and the employer may make rules governing employees not covered by the collective agreement.[20] Where there is a great variation in circumstances of employment or capacity of employees, the collective bargaining agreement may prescribe only minimum rates of pay or maximum hours or expressly leave certain areas open to individual bargaining.[21]

Individual contracts cannot defeat or delay the procedure prescribed by labor relations statutes,[22] or effectively waive any of the benefits of collective bargaining,[23] and such contracts in existence at the effective date of the labor relations statute providing for collective bargaining are terminated in so far as they interfere with the employee's freedom of choice in selecting a bargaining agent or with the free bargaining process.[24] A collective bargaining agreement circumscribes the rights of employer and employees with respect to making individual contracts of employment.[25] The collective agreement becomes a part of the contract of employment,[26] and it surmounts or supersedes the provisions of the individual contract as to terms and conditions of employment,[27] even though the individual contracts may be more advantageous to individual employees than the collective agreement.[28] Contracts of employment must be construed so as to include such terms of labor relations statutes as are applicable.[29]

The mere fact that an employee is a member of a labor union does not abrogate the employer's right to discharge him.[30] An employer has the right to refuse to maintain union standards.[31]

In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, nonmembership in a union may be made a condition of employment,[32] or a condition of continuance of employment,[33] and a labor union, by incorporating provisions into its constitution or by contract with its members, cannot abridge the employer's right to conduct an open shop.[34] Likewise, in the absence of statute, an employer's contract with a union cannot prevent an independent contract disregarding it,[35] but it may be read into the agreement of employment,[36] and there is a presumption that the contract of employment is to be read in the light of the union's by-laws in so far as these by-laws attempt to regulate the terms of employment of their members.[37]

Where the extent of a union delegate's authority is set forth in the agreement between the employer and the union, acts of the delegate in excess of his stated authority cannot modify individual agreements,[38] unless express authority is given outside the agreement,[39] or unless the union members ratify the modification of their individual agreements.[40]

3. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

§ 28(43). In General

a. Under federal statutes
b. Under state statutes

a. Under Federal Statutes

Although it does not undertake to specify in precise and unmistakable language each incident which might constitute an unfair labor practice, the National Labor Relations Act describes and defines unfair labor practices, and labor practices condemned as unfair are strictly limited to those enumerated in the statute.

The National Labor Relations Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158, describes and defines unfair labor practices; and labor practices condemned as unfair are strictly limited to those enumerated in the statute.[41] The act does not undertake to specify in precise and unmistakable language each incident which might constitute an unfair labor practice, but leaves to the National Labor Relations Board the work of applying the act's general prohibitory language in the light of the infinite combinations of events which might be charged as violative of its terms.[42] The statute does not seek to prohibit evil intent but unfair labor practices.[43] On the other hand, it does not excuse concerted activities themselves independently unlawful.[44] Individual contracts between employer and employees obtained as the result of an unfair labor practice may not be the bases of advantage to the violator of the act or of disadvantage to employees.[45]

b. Under State Statutes

State statutes relating to unfair labor practices embrace only those unfair labor practices listed in the statute; the public cannot be deprived of its right to protection against such practices by any agreement of employees and employer or litigation between them for vindication of their private rights.

Statutes relating to unfair labor practices have been enacted in some states.[46] The term "unfair labor practices" within a state statute providing for the state board to hold hearing on charges of such practices means only those unfair labor practices listed in the statute.[47] The public cannot be deprived of its right to protection against unfair labor practices under such statutes by any agreement of employees and employer or litigation between them for vindication of their private rights.[48]

§ 28(44). Unfair Labor Practices of Employer in General

The circumstances with which an employer is confronted do not excuse an unfair labor practice; and with respect to compliance with the statute his conduct will be judged by what he does as well as what he says.

The circumstances with which the employer is confronted do not justify disregard of statutes relating to unfair labor practices,[49] and such a practice cannot be excused because of economic pressure exerted against the employer by one of the unions engaged in a jurisdictional labor dispute.[50] With respect to compliance by the employer with the National Labor Relations Act, an employer's conduct will be judged not only by what he says, but what he does.[51] An employer's labor policy as evidenced by his conduct prior to the enactment of the statute is material to the question of the intent of his action after and under the act.[52] Hostility to outside unions and support of, or predilection for, a company union prior to the enactment of the act, unless later unequivocally repudiated so as to induce confidence in employees in their freedom of choice, is relevant in determination of unfair labor practices;[53] and it is proper for the labor relations board to consider the employer's recent and uniform hostility to organizational activities in appraising his conduct in his dealings with his employees.[54] The statutory prohibition of unfair labor practices designed by the employer to prevent free exercise of the employees' wishes with reference to membership in a union was intended as a grant of right to employees rather than as a grant of power to the union.[55]

Acts of supervisory employees. In order to constitute an unfair labor practice of an employer, it is not necessary that actions of supervisory employees actually reflect the employer's policy,[56] and it is sufficient that the employees have cause to believe that foremen who commit unfair labor practices are acting as representatives of the management.[57]

Violation of settlement agreement

The National Labor Relations Board is authorized to treat violations of a settlement agreement between the employer and the board by subsequent unfair labor practices, which indicate that the purpose of the settlement agreement has been thwarted, as entitling the board to make the previous, as well as the subsequent, unfair labor practices committed, the subject of an effectual order.—N. Construction of letter sent to employees

§ 28(45). Statutory Definition of Employer's Unfair Practices

a. Interference, restraint, or coercion
b. Domination of, or interference with, formation of labor organization or support thereof
c. Discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment
d. Discrimination for filing charges or testifying under statute
e. Refusal to bargain collectively

a. Interference, Restraint, or Coercion

Interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees by an employer in the exercise of their statutory rights of self-organization and collective bargaining may constitute an unfair labor practice regardless of the motive of the employer or of his success or failure in preventing organization.

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (a) (1), interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees by an employer in the exercise of their statutory rights of self-organization and collective bargaining constitutes an unfair labor practice,[61] regardless of the motive of the employer in so doing.[62] Interference, restraint, and coercion within the statute are not acts themselves but are descriptive and are the result of acts.[63] Whatever acts may have the effect of interference, restraint, and coercion are included in those terms, and are therefore prohibited.[64] Thus they include a great number of acts which ordinarily could be val-

Coercion of employees generally see supra § 27.

Particular acts of employer as unfair labor practices within statute see infra §§ 28(46)–28(62).

Course of conduct

Interference, coercion, and domination are active processes and may be inferred from a course of conduct even though no overt acts are proved, and the board must guard against subtle evasions by which attitudes, fair on their face, realistically viewed, amount to interference and coercion on part of employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., C.C.A.6, 147 F.2d 262.

Extent of improper conduct

(1) The slightest interference, intimidation or coercion by employer of the employees in exercise of right to self-organization constitutes an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. William Davies Co., C.C.A.7, 135 F.2d 179, certiorari denied William Davies Co. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 82, 320 U.S. 770, 88 L.Ed. 460.

(2) In order to constitute interference with employees' right to bargain collectively, it is not necessary that the interference be so substantial as to preclude the reasonable exercise of employees' right.—N. L. R. B. v. Cities Service Oil Co., C.C.A.2, 122 F.2d 149.

Totality of employer's activities

Where board found that anti-union remarks of two supervisors constituted unfair labor practices, but that the conduct of two other foremen did not constitute unfair labor practice the conduct of all supervisors might be considered as part of the totality of employer's activities.—North Carolina Finishing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 133 F.2d 714, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 39, 320 U.S. 738, 88 L.Ed. 437.

Prohibition not enforceable at common law

Prohibitions against interference by employers with self-organization of employees were not enforceable at common law.—Agwilines, Inc., v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 87 F.2d 146.

idly done, but when they interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights they are prohibited by the statute.[65] It is only necessary that the employer have interfered, intimidated, or coerced.[66] Duress is not necessary, but only interference,[67] and it is not necessary that the interference shall be successful in preventing organization.[68] The remedy furnished by the act is just as available when coercion succeeds as when it fails.[69] Interference is no less interference because it is accomplished through allurements rather than coercion.[70] On the question whether the employer is guilty of unfair labor practices each case must rest on its particular facts,[71] and the existence of employer interference must be determined by careful scrutiny of all the factors, often subtle, which restrain the employees' choice and for which the employer may fairly be said to be responsible.[72]

The statute does not protect a union against loss of its members as a result of a conspiracy between competing unions and employers except as incident to the determination by the National Labor Relations Board of its right to act as bargaining representative.[73]

Under a state labor relations act an employer's claim of harassment has been held to be no defense to a general claim of interference and coercion to prevent and discourage the employees from joining a union of their own choosing.[74] The maxim, "De minimis non curat lex," has no application, for employers may clearly manifest their active preference for one labor union and their intense displeasure with another by resorting to the most trifling forms of discrimination.[75]

b. Domination of, or Interference with, Formation of Labor Organization or Support Thereof

Under statutory provisions making it an unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it, support to be prohibited need not take financial forms, and a charge of domination cannot be insulated from unfair practices held to have interfered with organizational activities of employees.

Under the express provisions of the National Labor Relations Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (a) (2), it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it.[76] Support to be prohibited need not take financial forms.[77] A charge of domination cannot be insulated from un-

The test of employer's interference, restraint, and coercion of employees engaging in concerted union activities, is not the employer's motive or the success or failure of coercion, but is whether employer engaged in conduct which may reasonably be said to have tended to interfere with free exercise of employees' rights to engage in concerted union activities.—N. Effect of anti-union statements

Whether particular employees to whom anti-union statements were made were influenced or restrained was not necessarily the test of unfair labor practices, but it was pertinent to consider whether anti-union statements were made in a setting which could fairly be said to be symptomatic of an existent condition and whether the statements had a general, rather than a special, effect.—Boeing Airplane Co., Wichita Division, v. fair labor practices held to have interfered with the organizational activities of employees, either concurrent with, prior to, or subsequent to, organizational effort.[78] It is immaterial that an employee representation plan dominated and controlled by the employer had in fact not engendered, or indeed had obviated, serious labor disputes in the past, or that any company interference in the administration of the plan had been incidental rather than fundamental, and with good motives.[79] The formation of a labor organization has been held not to have been dominated by the employer merely because a foreman ordered some men under him to vote at an election to determine whether a proposed federation of employees was desired.[80] Payment of wages by the employer to employees for a few hours' time spent at meetings leading up to the organization of the union does not constitute attempted domination of the employees' choice of unions such as would make it an unfair labor practice.[81]

An employer cannot, by wrongfully dominating or interfering with a union, confer on himself the right to destroy the union,[82] and, even though a union is formed in violation of the statutory prohibition against employer domination, it is a labor organization under the protection of the National Labor Relations Act.[83]

Under some state statutes it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization.[84] The mere fact that an organization limited to employees of a particular employer is approved by the management does not constitute an unfair labor practice;[85] and a state statute providing that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to contribute financial or other support to any employee organization is not intended to prevent those who actually do the same work as the other members of a union from being members of that union or bearing their fair share of the expense of its maintenance by paying dues to that union.[86] Unfair labor practices of a labor organization in the conduct of a strike cannot be considered as in connection with, or as part of the actions forming the basis of, a complaint against the employer for interference in his employees' right to organize by aiding formation of a union in opposition to the complaining union within the meaning of a provision of the state labor relations act forfeiting the rights of a complainant found to be engaged in unfair labor practices in connection with, or as part of the action forming the basis of, the complaint,[87] and such provision, moreover, does not apply in considering a complaint filed before its enactment.[88]

c. Discrimination with Respect to Hire or Tenure of Employment

An employer who discriminates against certain employees because of their affiliation with a labor union or because of activity in a labor organization is guilty of an unfair labor practice unless such discrimination is in conformity with a valid closed-shop agreement.

In order to make out a charge of unfair labor practice under the provision of the National Labor Relations Act relating to discrimination to encourage or discourage union membership, it must appear that the employer by discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment encouraged or discouraged

Discharge of nonmembers

An employer may give support to a particular group of its employees within statutory definition of "unfair labor practice," by pursuing a policy of discharging those who refuse to join that group or who join a rival, obnoxious to the employer.—Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 104 F.2d 49.

Reason for rule

"If the reasoning of the defendants be carried to its logical conclusion, it would mean that only such labor organizations as are disapproved by employers would be valid in this state. No such antagonism between employer and employee could have reasonably been within the contemplation of the Legislature and certainly such a provocative public policy has not been expressed by it in the words of the statute or by any reasonable implication."—Breen v. membership in any labor organization.[89] There is no discrimination where union and nonunion members are similarly treated.[90] An employer who discriminates against certain employees because of their affiliation with a labor union or because of their activity in union organization, however, is guilty of an unfair labor practice under the statute[91] even though he believes that he has good business reasons to justify his discrimination;[92] but discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment in conformity with a valid closed-shop agreement has been held not to constitute an unfair labor practice within the statute.[93] The statute confers rights on employees, not on applicants for employment.[94] Acts and statements by an employer hostile to a union may properly be determined as discriminatory even though such acts or statements would not be so considered coming from an employer with a friendly attitude.[95]

Under state statutes. A provision in a state labor law making it an unfair labor practice for an employer to discourage membership in a labor organization by discrimination with respect to hire or tenure must be read into a contract between the employer and a labor union.[96]

d. Discrimination for Filing Charges or Testifying under Statute

The statutory provision making it an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under the act relates to testimony given in any proceeding under the act.

Under National Labor Relations Act, § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (a) (4), it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under the act.[97] Such provision relates to testimony given in any proceeding under the act.[98]

e. Refusal to Bargain Collectively

It is an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees respecting rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, where a specific request to bargain has been made.

Under National Labor Relations Act § 8, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158 (a) (5), it is an unfair practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees,[99] and it has been held that an unfair labor practice consisting of a

refusal to bargain collectively is also an unfair labor practice within other provisions of the statute.[1] The subject matter of collective bargaining embraced by the statute includes rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment,[2] and an employer's refusal to bargain about legislative policies and other generalities is not an unfair labor practice under the statute.[3] A specific request to bargain is a prerequisite to finding the employer guilty of an unfair labor practice for refusal to bargain,[4] and the employer's quick-tempered reaction to a protest by a union organizer whom he had never seen before does not dispense with the necessity for such request.[5]

Under some state statutes the refusal of an employer to bargain collectively with duly designated representatives of the employees is an unfair labor practice,[6] but an employer is not guilty of an unfair labor practice in refusing to deal with a union which at no time has represented a majority of his employees;[7] and, where a union has lost its right under its contract with the employer to an automatic renewal thereof by calling a strike on refusal of the employer to increase compensation of employees prior to the expiration of the contract, an order of the state board holding the employer guilty of an unfair labor practice in refusing to bargain with the union has been held to be erroneous.[8] The statutes do not preclude an employer from insisting on a final and full determination by the court of an issue properly pending therein, such as an employer's action to enjoin a labor union from violating the terms of a collective bargaining agreement.[9]

§ 28(46). Particular Acts of Employer

Various acts of an employer have been held to constitute or not to constitute unfair labor practices.

In addition to the particular acts considered in detail in the sections immediately following, various other acts of an employer have been held to constitute unfair labor practices,[10] such as active assistance to a citizen's committee in an anti-union cam-

Interference, restraint, or coercion

Disregard of employer's duty to bargain collectively only with duly recognized or accredited representative of employees, violates statute making it an unfair labor practice to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in exercise of rights to organize, bargain collectively, etc.—May Dept. Stores Co. v. N. L. R. B., 66 S.Ct. 203, 326 U.S. 376, 90 L.Ed. 145, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 468, 326 U.S. 811, 90 L.Ed. 495—N. L. R. B. v. National Broadcasting Co., C.C.A.2, 150 F.2d 895—N. L. R. Subcontracting

Under employer's contract with union providing that dispute as to interpretation of management clause should be settled within grievance procedures provided by contract and, if they failed, by arbitration, employer's declination to confer with union on question of subcontracting was not an unfair labor practice or a refusal to bargain, where employer and union had always theretofore deemed subcontracting a function of management, and the question involved interpretation of the management clause, and employer did not act in bad faith.—Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 161 F.2d 949.

10. "Booth renting"

Where beauty parlor operators, in order to avoid expenses incidental to cost of labor, adopted practice of "booth renting," whereby each employee was made a tenant with per cent of his commissions paying the rent, and employees adopted the method with understanding that probable alternative was operators' going out of business, method adopted was an unfair labor practice within state labor relations act.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. National Beauty Parlors, 45 N.Y.S. 2d 36, 180 Misc. 997.

Plan for purchase of stock by employees is not inherently bad or in contravention of statute, but is invalid where it binds employees to refrain from requesting a raise in wages, since such agreement deprives employees of right to designate agent to bargain with reference thereto.—N. L. R. B. v. Vincennes Steel Corporation, C.C.A.7, 117 F.2d 169.

Taking strike vote

Discrediting a labor organization,

paign,[11] circulation of petitions relating to union matters,[12] discontinuance of operations in order to discourage union membership,[13] refusal to arbitrate in accordance with terms of a collective bargaining contract,[14] or willingness to meet only with individuals and not with a union committee to discuss grievances.[15]

Other acts have been held not to constitute unfair labor practices,[16] such as consulting individuals as to matters not covered by a union contract,[17] continued indiscriminate enforcement of a preëxisting rule prohibiting display of union insignia on uniforms while on duty,[18] refusal to arbitrate while a strike in violation of agreement continued,[19] refusal to ac-which is an exclusive bargaining unit and which has taken a strike vote, by employer's taking a strike vote of his own is an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Inviting test of necessity of treating with union

Where an employer obviously did not mean to confer with a labor organization representing a majority of its employees and its president invited a test of the necessity of treating with the union and consistently followed that course, the National Labor Relations Board was justified in finding it guilty of unfair labor practices.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. Unusually severe punishment or a sudden discovery of employees' inefficiency when they join union may be ground for finding that employer had interfered with right of self-organization and to bargain collectively and had discriminated because of union activity.—N. L. R. B. v. Cities Service Oil Co., C.C.A.2, 129 F. 2d 933.

Employer's procurement of contract with employees, providing that they should have no right to demand closed shop or signed agreement by employer with any union, that employer had absolute, unqualified right to hire or discharge, and that employees would not strike, constituted unfair labor practice as interference with right to bargain collectively.—N. L. R. B. v. American Mfg. Co., C.C.A.2, 106 F.2d 61, modified on other grounds American Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 612, 309 U.S. 629, 84 L.Ed. 988.

Acquiescence in mayor's speech on premises

Employer's acquiescence in, and apparent approval of, mayor's speech on employer's premises during working hours, in which mayor stated that employer could and probably would move out if union came in, and that he, the mayor, did not see why employees should bring in some one to organize any union and that the employer would recognize a shop union, violated the National Labor Relations Act as an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. American Furnace Co., C.C.A.7, 158 F.2d 376.

Refusal to permit union delegates on premises

Refusal of owner of oil tankers to permit shore delegates of unions to come aboard while vessels are in port for purpose of conferring with seamen whom unions represent and negotiating with ships' officers concerning grievances, is an improper interference with employees' collective bargaining rights as against claim of owner that such refusal was necessary in order to protect vessels from spies and saboteurs where owner did not exclude laundry agents, extra work parties, and casual labor not members of the crew.—Richfield Oil Corp. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.9, 143 F.2d 860.

Refusal to treat with union representatives

(1) Dealing with employees directly, refusing to recognize authority of union's attorney, and refusing after strike to treat with any representative of union constitute unfair labor practice under statutory provision relating to interference, restraint, or coercion.—N. L. R. B. v. Highland Shoe, Inc., C.C.A.1, 119 F.2d 218.

(2) Employer, ignoring union as employees' exclusive bargaining representative, and negotiating with employees concerning wages at time when wage negotiations with union were pending, was also guilty of unfair practices.—Medo Photo Supply Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 830, 321 U.S. 678, 88 L.Ed. 1007.

16. Assigning place of work

Since the statute contemplates only those unfair labor practices listed in the statute, a barber shop proprietor is not guilty of unfair labor practice within state labor relations act in telling his barbers at what chairs in shop he wants them to work, although some chairs are more desirable than others.—New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Grasso, 69 N.Y.S.2d 711, 272 App. Div. 149.

Circulation of petition

An employer was not guilty of unfair labor practice because a nonsupervisory employee was permitted to act on employer's property and time in soliciting signatures to a petition that employees did not desire to be affiliated with any union, without having his wages docked, and because a general foreman discussed petition with the nonsupervisory employee where there was no showing that such action influenced the signers.—N. L. R. B. v. Appalachian Electric Power Co., C.C.A.4, 140 F.2d 217.

Reprimand

Notwithstanding the National Labor Relations Act, an employer may reprimand an employee for cause.—Fort Wayne Corrugated Paper Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 111 F.2d 869.

Treating grievances individually presented

Fact that employer notified employees of method of treating grievances individually presented when another scheme for treating grievances was already in effect under agreement with union did not constitute an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. North American Aviation, C.C.A.9, 136 F.2d 898.

Conditional proposal to negotiate

An employer's proposal to negotiate with respect to causes of strike, if employees would go back to work

cept a proposed arbitrator,[20] or refusal to discuss grievances with employee representatives who do not represent a majority of the employees.[21]

The making of a contract for collective bargaining does not absolvė the employer of his prior unfair labor practices when those practices were continued in substantially the same pattern after the contract had been entered into.[22]

Discrimination as to seniority rights. The deliberate violation of a seniority rule may constitute an unfair labor practice,[23] but various acts with respect to seniority rules have been held not to constitute unfair labor practices.[24] A railway employee's grievance with respect to loss of seniority when he was demoted is within the purview of the Railway Labor Act provision for settlement of disputes between individual employees and the employer.[25]

Gifts and favors to employees. The action of employees with respect to the choice of their bargaining agents may be induced by favors bestowed by the employer as well as by his threats or domination,[26] but an employer is not guilty of an unfair labor practice merely because he treats his employees well in order to forestall a union movement,[27] even though benefits are conferred during an election period.[28]

Inquiry as to union matters. The employer may inquire or be informed as to the progress of the efforts at unionization[29] or as to whether the union was organized[30] or has "washed up;"[31] but inquiry by an employer as to his employees' union affiliation has been held to be an unfair labor practice,[32] and a similar rule has been applied with respect to an employer's attempt to ascertain and identify union leaders,[33] and interrogation of employees concerning union membership[34] and activities.[35]

§ 28(47). —— Creation or Termination of Relationship in General

Except as provided otherwise by statute an employer may hire and discharge employees when and as he chooses, but the right is limited by the provisions and if grievances were filed in accordance with grievance procedures in contract with union, was not an unfair labor practice or a refusal to bargain, where strike was in breach of contract with union and employer's proposal was merely to carry on within normal processes of collective bargaining as provided for in contract, and was not in bad faith. —Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 161 F.2d 949.

Injured laborer

The fact that a laborer has sustained a slight injury not seriously interfering with his work has been held not to be a sufficient reason for preferring him in reëmployment in violation of a seniority rule.—Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

24. Hiring of new employees

The fact that an employer abandoned a long-standing seniority policy may not be argued in support of the conclusion that he discriminated against striking employees where he has hired new employees in numbers sufficient to operate his plant.—Wilson & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 120 F.2d 913.

Members of same union

An employer's action in giving preference to one employee over another contrary to the contract rule of seniority does not constitute an unfair labor practice under the National Labor Relations Act where both employees were members of the same union and it does not appear that the respective union activities of the two men had any influence whatever.—Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 111 F.2d 340.

Motive

Where an employer desires to operate his shop in accordance with his honest understanding of his contract with a labor organization providing for departmental seniority of employees, his motive, whether efficiency or economy, is proper as regards his rights after the labor organization refuses to permit operation of the shop on the principle of departmental seniority.—N. Effect dissipated by subsequent action of some labor relations acts. The labor relations board may not substitute its judgment for that of the employer in hiring or discharging employees.

Questioning of employees by superintendent, effect of which was dissipated by subsequent action, does not furnish basis for finding that employer was guilty of unfair labor practices.—Virginia Elec. & Power Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 115 F.2d 414, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 344, 314 U.S. 469, 86 L.Ed. 348.

An employee has no right to work on terms prescribed solely by himself,[36] and except as provided otherwise by statute the employer may hire and discharge workmen when and as he chooses.[37] So an employer has the right, in the conduct of his business, to employ workmen who are independent of any labor union[38] and to adopt a system of apprenticeship which excludes his apprentices from membership in such a union.[39] He has the same right, unless controlled by a contract, to refuse to continue in his employ those who become union members, as his employees have to refuse to continue in his employ unless he discharges all but union members.[40] Some labor relations acts leave an employer free to employ or discharge his employees as he sees fit, for good reason or for poor reason, or for no reason at all, subject only to the limitation that he may not require an employee, or one seeking employment, as a condition of employment, to join any company union, or to refrain from forming or joining, or assisting, a labor organization of his own choosing.[41] Under a statutory provision making it an unfair labor practice for an employer to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization, an employer may not require an applicant to join or resign from a union or insert in the contract of employment any other discriminatory term which encourages or discourages membership in a labor organization, except with respect to a labor organization which has been legally chosen to represent the employees.[42]

Power of labor relations board. The statutes do not authorize the labor relations board to substitute its judgment for that of an employer with respect to hiring or what is sufficient cause for discharging employees[43] or to interfere with his right to discharge for legitimate reasons.[44] While the board has power to determine whether an employee had been improperly discharged for union activity,[45] it cannot inquire into whether the employer is just or unjust, wise or unwise, in the exercise of its managerial judgment in selecting or discharging em-

Reduction of expenses
Employer's right to choose between laying off or discharging employees in order to reduce expenses because of a business recession was not limited either by state labor relations act or by agreement with labor union recognizing employer's right to discharge any employee for inefficiency and providing for departmental seniority preference in case of layoff.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Rating efficiency of employees Board has no jurisdiction to determine that a department store, in selecting for discharge because of business recession salesmen who were least efficient, should have rated employees according to their records over the entire period of their service rather than over a three-month period, where under the labor relations act it is for the employer to fix its own standard of efficiency in the absence of a limitation thereon in agreement with the labor union.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Kaufmann Department Stores, 29 A.2d 90, 345 Pa. 398.

Determination of necessity for dismissal
A labor relations board had no jurisdiction to determine whether it was necessary for department store to dismiss any of its employees because of a business recession, where employer has a right to determine how many salesmen it wishes to have in its employ and how many permanently to dismiss if it decides to reduce its sales force.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Kaufmann Department Stores, supra.

ployees,[46] but its inquiry must be confined to whether the employees have been discriminated against because of their union activities or affiliations.[47] The board may not command an employer to retain in his employ a discharged employee who is a member of the union unless it appears that the discharge was influenced by the employee's membership in the union and was calculated to interfere with the freedom of choice guaranteed by the act to all employees.[48] It may order reinstatement only when an employee is discharged for union membership or activities, in order to encourage or discourage membership in a labor organization.[49] Interference with the right of an employer to determine when an employee is inefficient should not be lightly indulged in when applying the act.[50] The board has the right to decide not only whether there was a proper cause for the discharge of the employee but also, conceding such cause, whether the employers acted on it or for reasons prohibited by the act.[51]

§ 28(48). —— Employment

a. In general
b. During strike

a. In General

Generally an employer has the right to hire his employees on the basis of individual merit without regard to union affiliation, and the National Labor Relations Act does not interfere with the normal exercise of his right; but refusal to hire an employee solely because of his affiliation with a labor union is an unfair labor practice.

Apart from statute, an employer has the right to hire his employees on the basis of individual merit, without regard to their affiliation or nonaffiliation with any labor organization.[52] The National Labor Relations Act does not interfere with the normal exercise of the right of the employer to select his employees[53] and does not impose an obligation on

Lawful exercise of authority

(1) Where master exercises right of discharge for reasons other than intimidation or coercion with respect to union activities or as part of an unfair labor practice, state labor relations board is not entitled to disregard master's lawful exercise of authority or make it a pretext for interference with the right of discharge.—New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Union Club of City of N. Y., 52 N.Y.S.2d 74, 268 App.Div. 516, reversed on other grounds 68 N.E.2d 29, 295 N.Y. 915.

(2) Provision of contract with labor union that in case of layoff seniority rights should cease after six months impliedly fixed such time as the normal limit for a layoff as distinguished from a discharge, so that failure to replace discharged employees within six months would indicate that employer acted in good faith in discharging rather than laying them off.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Kaufmann Department Stores, 29 A.2d 90, 345 Pa. 398.

Reinstatement of employees in general see infra § 28 (51).

Discharge for inefficiency

Where fewer employees were needed to operate oil and gas repressure plant after strike due to depletion of stripper wells resulting from injury to employer's property during strike, employer had the right to exercise a choice between efficiency and inefficiency, as respects right of board to order reinstatement of discharged employees.—N. L. R. B. v. Bell Oil & Gas Co., C.C.A. 5, 98 F.2d 406, rehearing denied 98 F.2d 870.

Minor misconduct on the part of the employee would not deprive board of power to apply the remedial provisions of statute unless it was the cause for the refusal to reinstate.—American Smelting & Refining Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 126 F.2d 680.

Time of discharge

The fact that employees whose reinstatement was ordered by the board were discharged during interim between expiration of first and execution of second agreement between employer and the union did not affect question of right of employees to reinstatement, where adjournment of conference when second agreement was being formulated occurred at the request of union representatives and the officials representing the employer agreed to consider the matter of the discharges on their merits without reference as to whether or not an agreement was in existence.—N. an employer to favor union members in hiring employees[54] or prevent him, for good sufficient reasons, from refusing to employ a union applicant[55] or anyone;[56] but an employer may not refuse to hire employees solely because of their affiliation with a labor union,[57] and refusal to hire an employee solely because of his affiliation with a labor union is an unfair labor practice.[58] Refusal to violate a valid contract with a union by reëmploying discharged nonunion men is not an unfair labor practice.[59]

Under state statutes. Under the provisions of some state labor relations acts, an employer may not require an employee, or one seeking employment, as a condition of employment, to join any company union[60] or to refrain from forming or joining, or assisting, a labor organization of his own choosing,[61] and refusal to employ a person solely because of membership in a labor union constitutes an unfair labor practice.[62]

b. During Strike

It does not constitute an unfair labor practice for an employer, who is confronted with a concerted refusal on the part of a labor union to permit its members to perform their contracts with him, to procure others to fill their places or to assure those who accept employment during a strike that their employment is permanent.

Where an employer is confronted with a concerted refusal on the part of a labor union to permit its members to perform their contracts with him, there is nothing unlawful in his attempt to procure others to fill their places,[63] and such others have a right to accept the employment,[64] and such hiring does not constitute an unfair labor practice.[65] The employer is at liberty to make a contract with a new labor union for services of workmen to fill the places of his former employees.[66] In such case the offering of reëmployment to some of the old employees on a new and different basis does not constitute discrimination against the labor organization representing them,[67] for, if the whole body of employees has been lawfully discharged, the law does not prohibit the making of individual contracts with men whose prior relations have thereby been severed.[68] Since, as discussed infra § 28 (51) b, an employer who has been guilty of no unfair labor practice is not bound to discharge those hired to fill the places of strikers, on the election of the latter to resume their employment, in order to create places for them, the assurance by the employer to those who accept employment during the strike that if they so desire their places may be permanent is not an unfair labor practice.[69]

§ 28(49). —— Discharge

a. In general
b. Effect of National Labor Relations Act
c. Effect of state statutes

a. In General

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, an employer has the right to discharge his employees for cause or without cause and without regard to their affiliation or nonaffiliation with any labor union.

In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, it is the right of an employer to discharge his employees without regard to their affiliation or nonaffiliation with any labor organization.[70] The right to discharge for cause has not been taken away from the employer by reason of the passage of labor relations legislation[71] and an employer may also, without any reason therefor, discharge an employee;[72] but the absence of a reason in connection with other circumstances may point strongly to a discrimination in violation of labor relations legislation.[73]

b. Effect of National Labor Relations Act

(a) In general
(b) Employees on strike

(a) In General

The National Labor Relations Act does not interfere with the normal exercise of the right of the employer to discharge his employees, and the exercise of that right does not constitute an unfair labor practice or coercion unless it is for a reason prohibited by the act, such as for union activity or agitation for collective bargaining.

The National Labor Relations Act does not interfere with the normal exercise of the right of the Acquiescing in union's ejection of crew members who had transferred their affiliations and hiring men belonging to union to take their place was discharge because of union membership.—N. L. R. B. v. Isthmian S. S. Co., C.C.A.2, 126 F.2d 598.

Discharge and layoff of members of affiliated union while retaining employees who had worked for a shorter time but were members of company union was unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Quality Art Novelty Co., C.C.A.2, 127 F.2d 903.

Discharges for particular reasons held to constitute unfair labor practices.

(1) Because of employee's sympathy with union members.—N. L. R. B. v. J. G. Boswell Co., C.C.A.9, 136 F.2d 585.

(2) For belonging to labor organization which was illegal because dominated by employer.—E. Anthony & Sons v. N. L. R. B., App.D.C., 163 F.2d 22.

(3) For instigating union resolution protesting employer's action with respect to a strike, since such resolution was not a libel.—N. L. R. B. v. Peter Cailler Kohler Swiss Chocolates Co., C.C.A.2, 130 F.2d 503.

(4) For seeking to prevent employer from taking strike vote after the union has taken a strike vote.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C. C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. S., 58 S.Ct. 1054, 304 U. (5) For wearing union insignia.—Republic Aviation Corp. v. N. L. R. B., 65 S.Ct. 982, 324 U.S. 793, 89 L. Ed. 1372, 157 A.L.R. 1081—N. L. R. B. v. Le Tourneau Co. of Ga., 65 S. Ct. 982, 324 U.S. 793, 89 L.Ed. 1372, 157 A.L.R. 1081, rehearing denied 65 S.Ct. 1401, 325 U.S. 894, 89 L.Ed. 2005.

(6) To stop employee from electioneering for union.—N. L. R. B. v. Columbia Products Corporation, C. C.A.2, 141 F.2d 687.

Employment at will

(1) The statute does not outlaw discrimination only where there is in existence a formal contract or relation of employment, but embraces as well all elements of the employment relationship which in fact customarily attend employments. —N. L. R. B. v. Waterman S. S. Corporation, 60 S.Ct. 493, 309 U.S. 206, 84 L.Ed. 704, rehearing denied 60 S. Ct. 611, 309 U.S. 696, 84 L.Ed. 1036.

(2) Employer may not terminate employment or term or condition of employment because of union activity or affiliation, even though employment is at will.—N. L. R. B. v. Waterman S. S. Corp., supra.

bargaining.[79] An employee who is not a member of a union is none the less entitled to the protection of the act if termination of his employment is occasioned by an unfair labor practice designed to interfere with the employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by the terms of the statute.[80]

Membership or office in a union is not a guarantee against discharge,[81] nor does the act require the employer to discriminate in favor of union men as against nonunion men where economic considerations necessitate a contraction in the employer's labor force;[82] and the mere fact that the employer dislikes a union or a union man does not prevent his exercising his undoubted right to discharge when real grounds for discharge exist.[83] The true reason back of the discharge must be ascertained,[84] and such reason may be sought in the circumstances surrounding the discharge.[85] Where discharge is because of union membership the act may not be evaded by assigning some other ground.[86] On the other hand, where there was cause for the employee's discharge, fragmentary and unrelated suspicions are insufficient in substance to transform a proper exercise of the power to discharge into an improper one.[87] The fact that an employee who resigned under pressure exerted because of his union activities did not seek or want reëmployment or back pay does not purge the employer of his unfair practices.[88]

Discharge for violation of rules. The National Labor Relations Act does not prevent an employer from making and enforcing reasonable rules covering the conduct of employees on company time[89] or from discharging employees for breach of such rules.[90] The discharge of an employee for violation of a rule prohibiting union solicitation during

Prior affiliation with particular union
Under the act no employee can be deprived of his employment because of his prior affiliation with any particular union.—Wallace Corporation v. working hours is not an unfair labor practice provided the rule is promulgated in good faith and bears some reasonable relation to the efficient operation of the plant or business and is not merely a device to obstruct or impede self-organization.[91] Even though the employer's rule is against solicitation generally and is enforced against all solicitations and not discriminatorily applied against union solicitation, discharge of employees because of union solicitation on the employer's premises during the employee's own time constitutes an unfair labor practice because it discourages membership in labor organizations.[92]

Discharge for refusal to join union. In the absence of an agreement with a lawful union with which the employer has a bargaining agreement requiring membership in the union, the employer's discharge of an employee because of his refusal to join the union is an unfair labor practice,[93] since such conduct constitutes interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees in the exercise of their statutory rights,[94] and discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment to encourage or discourage membership in labor organization.[95] Also, under the provision making it an unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it, the discharge by an employer of employees who refuse to join a local independent union which is dominated, controlled, and supported by the employer is illegal.[96]

Contract for closed shop. While the rule is otherwise as to a discharge pursuant to an invalid contract,[97] a discharge pursuant to a valid maintenance of membership provision in a collective bargaining agreement has been held not to be an unfair labor practice;[98] but the closed-shop provision of the contract between the employer and the union cannot be invoked to justify the discharge by the employer of an employee expelled by the union because he supported another union in an election for bargaining agent of the employer's employees[99] or because the discharged employee testified in favor of a rival union at a hearing by the labor relations board.[1]

Discharge prior to effective date of statute. The discharge of employees prior to the effective date of the statute, because of union activities, has been held not to be an unfair labor practice.[2]

Application of valid portion of company rule

An employer's rule as far as it forbade solicitation for union membership on the employer's premises during working hours was valid, and the fact that the order posted did not limit its operation to working hours did not prevent application of the rule.—N. conducted strike may be discharged by an employer even though he has been guilty of unfair labor practices.

Where an employer's illegal or unfair labor practices are responsible for a strike, discharge of the strikers has been held to constitute a direct violation of the statute[3] and to be unjustified;[4] but where an employee engages in such conduct as would justify an employer in discharging him if a strike were not in effect the National Labor Relations Act does not prevent such discharge.[5] Where the discharge of employees for disobedience of a rule of the employer, and a strike to compel a modification of the rule, happened at about the same time, the existence of the strike as a factor of paramount importance should be recognized and given the effect provided by the National Labor Relations Act, although the decision to discharge in case of continued disobedience to the rule was first taken and first announced.[6]

Illegal or unlawfully conducted strike. An illegal strike constitutes sufficient justification for the discharge of the strikers[7] or for the discharge of one who refuses to work because the strike is on.[8] The National Labor Relations Act does not undertake to abrogate the right of an employer to refuse to retain in his employ those who illegally take and hold possession of his property.[9] or who forcibly or unlawfully bar him from his plant,[10] and when employees engage in an unlawful sit-down strike they may be discharged by an employer even though he has been guilty of unfair labor practices.[11] The provision expressly recognizing the right of employees to engage in concerted activities does not confer on them the right to engage en masse in unlawful activities, or to defy the authority of the employer to manage his business while remaining in his service.[12]

Sabotage
With respect to employer's right to discharge sit-down strikers, who broke windows of buildings occupied by them to obtain air in combating gas used to compel surrender, who permitted furnaces to burn out, and who destroyed supplies by throwing them from the windows in resisting eviction, such strikers were guilty of malicious sabotage of equipment, notwithstanding there was no serious injury to machinery.—Fansteel Metallurgical Corporation v. Sit-down strike as unlawful generally see supra § 28 (19).

Statement of cause for discharge
Where employer's representatives demanded that sit-down strikers leave plant and on their refusal announced that they were discharged for the seizure and retention of buildings, the fact that it was a general announcement applicable to all men in the plant who refused to leave did not detract from the effect of the discharge.—N. fact that an employer has been guilty of an unfair labor practice does not deprive him of the right to discharge employees for insubordination.

Under the provisions of some state labor relations acts, discharge of employees because of union activities is unlawful;[13] and an employer may not, under cover of his right to discharge employees, and in violation of the provisions of the labor relations acts, interfere with, restrain, or coerce his employees in the exercise of their rights of self-organization and collective bargaining[14] or discriminate against them because of union activity.[15] When an employer dismisses an employee for union activities or discriminates with respect to his tenure for this reason, it is of no consequence that the discharged employee is not actually a member of the union.[16] An employer's claim of harassment is not a defense to a charge of wrongful discharge of an employee;[17] but, on the other hand, an employer's lack of good faith in bargaining, even though it amounts to an unfair labor practice, does not deprive him of the right to discharge employees because of their insubordination.[18]

§ 28(50). —— Layoff

A layoff is not necessarily an unfair labor practice, but it becomes such when motivated by a purpose forbidden by the labor relations statute.

A layoff is a termination of employment at the will of the employer, without prejudice to the worker.[19] A layoff is not necessarily an unfair labor practice,[20] but it becomes such when motivated by a purpose forbidden by the labor relations statute.[21] Thus the National Labor Relations Board should not interfere because of discrimination in bona fide layoffs unless the discrimination is due to union activities.[22] Where the employer had a policy of laying off and taking on during depression periods according to seniority and of retaining key men by transfers and staggering work, the board is entitled to hold the employer strictly to the policy as it affects a discharged employee who the employer claims would have been laid off in the normal course of events.[23] It is no defense to proceedings by the board against an employer for discriminatory discharge of employees that the layoffs were pur-

Discharge as burdening or obstructing commerce

Discharge by employer of employees because of activities relating to organization and affiliation of employees with labor union was a denial by employer of the right of employees to organize for their own welfare, and the necessary effect of such denial was a burdening or obstructing of commerce within state statutes.—Teamsters Local Union No. 222 v. Suspension for distributing union literature

Where employees distributed leaflets regarding radio program concerning board's decision, and referring to local union as company dominated, action of employer in suspending employees did not authorize finding of unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Aintree Corporation, C.C. A.7, 135 F.2d 395.

Layoff of men who denied violating company rule, as distinguished from one who immediately acknowledged his fault, was a reasonable disciplinary action and not unlawful.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 162 F.2d 287.

Layoff for union activities

(1) Layoff of members of affiliated union while retaining employees who had worked for a shorter time but who were members of company union was unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Quality Art Novelty Co., C. C.A.2, 127 F.2d 903.

(2) An employer's laying off of employee who was member of editorial committee of union bulletin which published inaccurate figures of wage rates procured by union in other companies, and who promised to publish correction which did not appear in the next regular bulletin, was an improper interference with employee's right to engage in union activities.—N. L. R. B. v. Illinois Tool Works, C.C.A.7, 153 F.2d 811.

(3) Such lay off was not a settlement of tort committed by employee, since the indispensable element of mutual assent to compromise was lacking.—N. L. R. B. v. Illinois Tool Works, supra.

(4) Where there was no sufficient evidence of why one employee was laid off and another employee, over whom he had seniority, was retained, board was justified in considering employer's hostile attitude toward outside unions.—Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 111 F.2d 340.

suant to a contract with a union dominated by the employer.[24] Although union activity or holding office in a union is a fact to be considered on the issue of discrimination, membership or office in a union is not a guarantee against layoff.[25]

§ 28(51). —— Reinstatement or Refusal to Reinstate

a. In general
b. Employees on strike

a. In General

There is no obligation to reinstate an employee who was discharged for legitimate cause or who quit his job without legitimate cause, and refusal of an employer to reinstate such an employee is not an unfair labor practice; but an employer is under a duty to reinstate an employee who was discharged in violation of the labor relations act.

There is no obligation to reinstate an employee who was discharged for legitimate cause[26] or one who quit his job without legitimate cause,[27] and refusal of an employer to reinstate such an employee is not an unfair labor practice.[28] An employer is not required to reinstate an employee who walked out in anger when assigned to certain work, whether he was discharged or whether he quit his job,[29] even though the same offense had been committed in the past with less serious consequences.[30] The conviction of an employee of the crime of larceny is justification for refusal to reinstate an employee wrongfully discharged under the National Labor Relations Act[31] even though the property stolen was not that of the employer,[32] but where an employee was discriminatorily discharged because of union activity the employer cannot in good faith urge, as the basis for refusal to reinstate him, his criminal record which was known to the employer long before his discharge.[33] The duty of an employer to reinstate employees discharged in violation of the act arises from the statute's specific provisions for such a mandate to effectuate its purpose.[34] Willingness to reinstate employees only on conditions which the employer has no right to attach is equivalent to absolute refusal to reinstate,[35] and the imposition of a condition which requires the union to abandon rights to which it is entitled under the National Labor Relations Act is an unfair labor practice.[36] The fact that employees of a war contractor ceased work in violation of the War Labor Disputes Act did not deprive them of their rights under the National Labor Relations Act.[37] Reopening the employer's plant following a pretended closing and hiring many of the former employees, but omitting union members, is an unfair labor practice.[38]

b. Employees on Strike

As a general rule striking employees are entitled to reinstatement; but the rule is otherwise where they have been guilty of unlawful conduct or where an employer who has been guilty of no unfair labor practice has hired others to fill the places of the strikers.

Whether strikers are entitled to reinstatement and back pay depends on whether they were guilty of such unlawful conduct as to terminate their status as employees.[39] As a general rule employees on strike because of the employer's unfair labor practices are entitled to an offer of reinstatement,[40] and the offer must be one made in good faith and calculated to place strikers on the same basis of rights and privileges as all other workers;[41] and it has

Discrimination

(1) Discrimination in reinstating striking employees because of their activity in connection with the strike is prohibited by the National Labor Relations Act.—Hamilton v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 160 F.2d 465.

(2) Employees who failed to accept employer's alleged offer of reinstatement after going on strike induced by employer's unfair labor practices did not cease to be employees, where some of them who did return were discriminated against after resuming their work.—N. L. R. B. v. A. Sartorius & Co., C.C.A.2, 140 F.2d 203.

been held that an employer who denies further employment to employees merely because they have taken part in a strike performs an unlawful act.[42] Where the employer has been guilty of an unfair labor practice, he is under a duty, on application, to reinstate striking employees,[43] even though this may occasion the discharge of those employees hired to take the place of strikers during the strike,[44] and refusal to do so constitutes an unfair labor practice,[45] since it is a discrimination in the hiring and tenure of the striking employees.[46] Even where a strike, which initially involved no unfair labor practice, is prolonged or aggravated by an employer's unfair labor practice, the employer has been held to be bound to reinstate all strikers and discharge all those hired to replace them during the strike.[47]

An employer who has been guilty of no unfair labor practice, however, is not bound to discharge those hired to fill the places of strikers, in order to create places for them, on the election of the latter to resume their employment.[48] The employer is not excused from reinstating striking employees where nonstriking employees have been transferred in a makeshift arrangement but no replacements have been made.[49] Failure to reëmploy striking employees because they engaged in a strike may be an interference with their right to engage in "concerted activities"[50] and may therefore constitute an unfair labor practice under the provision of the act prohibiting interference with the right to engage in concerted activity;[51] but such a violation in and of itself will not warrant a finding of violation of the provision against discrimination in such manner as to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.[52]

Conduct held not refusal to reinstate

U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Register Pub. Co., C.C.A.9, 141 F.2d 156.

Refusal of offer of reinstatement not fairly made

An employer was not relieved of its obligation to reinstate striking employees because its offer of reinstatement to any strikers who desired to return to work was refused by strikers, where employer did not make a full and fair offer of reinstatement to the strikers.—N. L. R. B. v. Poultrymen's Service Corporation, C.C.A.3, 138 F.2d 204.

Strike caused in part by wrongful refusal to negotiate

Although the wrongful refusal of an employer to negotiate was only one of the causes of a strike, where the employer cannot show that the negotiations, if undertaken, would have broken down, reinstatement of employees cannot be denied on the ground that the loss of their jobs was due to a controversy which the statute does not regulate.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. Sufficiency of request for reinstatement Letter from union requesting meeting with employer for purpose of renewing negotiations and reaching agreement for reinstatement of striking employees was not a request for reinstatement of strikers on which employer's failure to reinstate could be found to be an unfair labor practice.—N. L. R. B. v. Register Pub. Co., C.C.A.9, 141 F.2d 156.

Where employer hired new employees after strike was terminated and application had been made by old employees for reinstatement, such action constituted unfair labor practice within National Labor Relations Act.—N. L. R. B. v. Shenandoah-Dives Mining Co., C.C.A.10, 145 F.2d 542.

Strike of lawfully discharged employees

Where employees have been lawfully discharged for refusal to obey the rules laid down by a law-abiding employer for the conduct of the business, even though they subsequently engage in a strike, the employer may fill the places left vacant and is not obligated to discharge the new employees when the strikers change their minds and apply for reinstatement.—Home Beneficial Life Ins. 51. U.S.—Western Cartridge Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

The employer may not lawfully do anything in connection with the reinstatement of the strikers to discourage the right of collective bargaining.[53] An employer's refusal to reinstate striking employees unless they give up their seniority rights constitutes an unfair labor practice.[54] Refusal by the employer to put men guilty of certain acts back to work does not constitute the unfair labor practice of arbitrarily refusing to negotiate respecting the return to work of men on strike.[55]

Illegal or unlawfully conducted strike. An employer is justified in refusing to reinstate any employees who participate in an unauthorized or "wildcat" strike,[56] and refusal to reëmploy such employees[57] or to accede to the request of a conciliation commissioner to reëmploy them[58] does not constitute an unfair labor practice. Striking employees who commit unwarranted acts of trespass or violence against the property of the employer are not entitled to reinstatement,[59] although the mere fact that striking employees are members of a union which conducted the strike in an unlawful manner does not warrant refusal to reinstate them in the absence of clear proof of actual participation in, or authorization of, the unlawful acts.[60]

The employer has the right to determine which striking employees have engaged in unlawful conduct,[61] but not to discriminate against a striker under the guise that he has engaged in unlawful conduct.[62] He is not required to take back all striking employees regardless of their unlawful conduct[63] or to reinstate all striking employees and then later discharge those who participated in unlawful activities where he has hired new employees to take the place of the strikers and has obligated himself to furnish them permanent employment.[64] He has the privilege of selecting from those guilty of violence the ones whom he will reinstate,[65] and it is not an unfair labor practice to reinstate only as many of the strikers as there are vacant places to be filled.[66]

The employer is not required, before an application for reinstatement is made, to identify union members whom he might deem objectionable.[67] The fact that striking employees who have participated in violence and unlawful activities are union officials does not minimize the employer's right to Sit-down strike as unlawful generally see supra § 28 (19).

Forcible denial of employer's right to enter

(1) The forcible denial by employee of employer's right to go upon its property is the equivalent of a seizure of employer's property, as respects discharged employee's right to reinstatement under the National Labor Relations Act.—N. L. R. B. v. Perfect Circle Co., C.C.A.7, 162 F.2d 566.

(2) Employer which was denied possession of its property by four striking employees, and which was justified in its belief from words and acts of the employees that it could not get possession save through a fight, was not required to take chance of bloodshed in order to justify discharge of those who unlawfully obstructed its entry, and employer could not be required to reinstate the employees after having discharged them.—N. Reason for rule

Implied termination of employer-employee relationship by reason of unlawful conduct in labor controversies applies only to those actually participating in violence and their aiders and abettors.—N. L. R. B. v. Ohio Calcium Co., C.C.A.6, 133 F.2d 721.

Unlawful purpose and conduct of strike

Minority employees, who called a strike for an illegal purpose of forcing employer to violate the wartime wage freeze, who conducted strike unlawfully, and who were discharged by employer, were not entitled to reinstatement or back pay.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana Desk Co., C.C.A.7, 149 F.2d 987.

Unlawful picketing

(1) Picketing, which was not conducted for purpose of publicizing strike or any grievance against employer or for purpose of persuading nonstrikers to join strikers or to refrain from going to work during strike, but which was designed and maintained for avowed purpose of forcibly excluding all employees from entering plant, conducted by pickets who were prepared to use any force necessary to accomplish the purpose, was unlawful.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana Desk Co., supra.

(2) Misconduct of pickets is not to be measured by the amount of violence which occurs, and fact that violence did not take place due solely to the forbearance of employer and nonstrikers could not be considered as establishing that picketing was peaceful.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana Desk Co., supra.

refuse reinstatement,[68] but discrimination in reinstating striking employees by keeping out certain of them for the sole reason that they have been active in the union constitutes an unfair labor practice.[69] Failure of the employer to specify the particular types of conduct he might consider sufficient to bar reinstatement is immaterial where the conduct specified consisted of unlawful, violent, and criminal acts.[70] The fact that strikers who participated in an illegal strike were subsequently allowed to return to work does not require the reinstatement of a nonunion foreman who was discharged because he refused to work while the illegal strike was in progress.[71] Where there has been an agreement on the employer's part, when inviting employees to return to their old places after a sit-down strike, to accept all employees subject only to matters specified, the employer may not refuse reëmployment for any reason other than those specified or the absence of an opening.[72]

§ 28(52). —— Assistance to Union

The statute does not prevent mutual assistance and coöperation between an employer and a labor organization unless such assistance amounts to an unfair labor practice, but it may be an unfair labor practice for an employer to support a company union or coöperate with unions for the purpose of securing new members.

Labor relations legislation does not prevent mutual assistance and coöperation between an employer and a labor organization representing a majority of the employees unless such assistance amounts to an unfair labor practice.[73] It was not intended to prohibit friendly intercourse between employers and labor organizations or to outlaw the extension of common courtesies.[74] It is more in keeping with the purpose of the statutes to foster such friendship rather than to condemn it.[75] It is, however, an unfair labor practice for an employer, prior to the execution of a closed-shop agreement, to coöperate with unions representing an uncoerced majority of its employees for the purpose of securing new members.[76] So the act of the employer in favoring one union over another in a jurisdictional dispute may be an unfair labor practice,[77] even though he is motivated by his own economic interest and has no desire to injure one union or help the other;[78] but where an employer has an unimpeachable closed shop contract with one union he is justified in supporting such union and opposing another union in a jurisdictional dispute between the unions.[79] While the prior existence and subsequent dissolu-

Failure to discipline employees for leaving plant for the purpose of holding an organizational meeting does not constitute an unfair labor practice, since a walkout is, in practical aspect, a strike, and strikers may not be discharged for exercising their inherent right to strike.—N. L. R. B. v. Clinton Woolen Mfg. Co., C.C.A.6, 141 F.2d 753.

Unauthorized union shop contract

An employer, engaged in interstate commerce, is guilty of unfair labor practice in standing on the performance of a union shop contract which purports to bind all employees unless that contract was authorized by the National Labor Relations Act.—Stone Logging & Contracting Co. v. tion of a company representation plan do not per se constitute an unfair labor practice or coercion of the employees,[80] and the fact that an independent union was quickly formed and promptly recognized by the employer following dissolution of a prior union is not an unfair labor practice[81] notwithstanding former officers of the prior union took an active part in the formation of the new union,[82] an employer's support of a company union,[83] and attempts to prevent the organization of his plant by outside unions,[84] as by discriminating in favor of members of the company union and against members of the outside union,[85] may constitute an unfair labor practice. An employer may be held to have assisted the formation of a union even though the acts of so-called agents were not expressly authorized or might not be attributable to him on strict application of the rules of respondeat superior.[86] The unanimous ratification of a closed-shop agreement at a meeting attended by all employees does not overcome the effect of the employer's unfair labor practice in favoring a particular union where plant supervisors who have been instrumental in negotiations leading to the agreement are present.[87]

Procuring formation of new union. The act of an employer in procuring the formation of a new union constitutes an interference with, restraint, or coercion of employees in the exercise of their statutory rights, and is therefore an unfair labor practice.[88]

§ 28(53). —— Employment of Undercover Operatives, Detectives, Etc.

The employment of undercover operatives to spy on employees in their efforts to organize and on union affairs, or the surveillance by an employer of union meetings and activities, may constitute an unfair labor practice where it results in actual interference or domination.

The employment of undercover operatives or missionaries to spy on employees in their effort to organize and on union affairs is a violation of the statute defining unfair labor practices,[89] at least where it results in actual interference with union activity,[90] even though the employees do not know they are being watched;[91] but there is authority holding that the surveillance by an employer of the meetings and activities of a union is not an unfair labor practice unless it interferes with, restrains, or coerces his employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the statute, or dominates or interferes with a labor organization.[92]

§ 28(54). —— Execution of Contract with Employer-Dominated Organization

Execution of a contract by the employer with a union which he dominates and supports constitutes an unfair labor practice.

Execution of a contract by the employer with a union which the employer dominates and supports constitutes an unfair labor practice on the part of the employer[93] under the statutory provisions relating to interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees in the exercise of their statutory rights,[94] domination or interference with the formation or administration of labor organizations,[95] and discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to discourage membership in a labor organization.[96]

§ 28(55). —— Expression of Views

Labor relations statutes do not take away an employer's right to freedom of speech or make it an unfair labor practice for him to state his views on labor policies and problems, provided he does not act threateningly or coercively.

It has been said that under the National Labor Relations Act it devolves on an employer to assume a position of honest impartiality and neutrality and to refrain from communicating his managerial prejudices in an effort to sway the employees from making a free choice with respect to joining a union or pursuing such choice once it has been made.[97] The act, however, does not take away the employer's right to freedom of speech,[98] and, before oral statements of an employer may be held to constitute an unfair labor practice, it must appear that they interfered with, restrained, or coerced employees in the rights guaranteed by the act, that is to say, the right to join labor organizations, to bargain collectively, and to engage in concerted activities.[99] Accordingly, in the absence of any interference with attempts of his employees to organize or of any threat of discrimination, it does not constitute an unfair labor practice for the employer to state his views on labor policies and problems[1] such as his opposition to the closed shop.[2]

The employer is as free as ever to take any side he may choose in determining the issue of representation of his employees by a labor union.[3] As long as the expression is not coercive, it does not constitute an unfair labor practice for the employer to express a preference for one union over another,[4] nor does it constitute an unfair labor prac-

Compulsory attendance at meetings

Where employees, prior to election at which union membership was to be decided, were called in groups to hear message from employer's labor relation manager, and employees were paid for time spent at the meetings and were not inconvenienced, if employees were influenced against their will by arguments presented, compulsory attendance did not constitute a species of coercion in violation of National Labor Relations Act, since it was a legitimate consequence of free speech and presumably one of its purposes, since free speech cannot be limited to ineffective speech.—N. L. R. B. v. Montgomery Ward & Co., C.C.A.8, 157 F.2d 486.

Slight suggestions to employees as to employer's choice between unions to act as bargaining agency, standing alone, are not sufficient to sustain a finding of unfair labor practice to disparage the union[5] or to express his hostility to a union if he has any,[6] and his opinion of the leaders of the union, be that opinion good or bad.[7] He may appeal to the employees' gratitude to convince them that a union is unnecessary.[8] Furthermore, the employer may, by proper persuasion, induce union members to resign from their organizations,[9] using lawful means for that purpose.[10]

The employer may not use the right of freedom of speech threateningly or coercively,[11] especially tices.—Edward G. Budd Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 142 F.2d 922.

Interpretation in light of previous labor relations

Employer's letters to employees which, standing alone, were concededly susceptible of merely stating that employees were not required to join any particular union and that they could form their own union and that, arguing from past experiences, employees would do well to form their own union, were not required to be interpreted in light of employer's labor relations over ten-year period preceding decree enforcing board's order directing employer to cease certain unfair labor practices. —Edward G. Budd Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

Celebration of defeat of union

Fact that some representatives of the management attended a celebration of the defeat of a particular union in election was immaterial, since it was not illegal for them to express their preference either before or after the election.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 162 F. 2d 287.

Prior to enactment of National Labor Relations Act, a representative plan of organization of employees was lawful and there was no valid law inhibiting an employer from expressing to his employees his opposition to one form of union organization and preference for another.—Nevada Consol. where he has within himself the power to enforce his threats.[12] Thus he does not have the right to threaten to discharge or discriminate against an employee for union membership or activities[13] and it is an unfair labor practice for the employer to suggest that his plant might be closed if it were unionized,[14] to suggest that the benefits of a liberal labor policy would be lost if a union is organized,[15] or to express an opinion which is intended to discourage and in fact does discourage union activity.[16]

In determining whether there was an unfair labor practice, the employer's statement must be interpreted as a whole and not from certain phrases isolated from the context.[17] The effectiveness or accuracy of the employer's expression of his views is not determinative of whether the statement of them constitutes an unfair labor practice.[18] Misrepresentation by the employer of the legal effect of contracts with individual employees is improper and may be properly prohibited.[19]

State statutes have been held not to prevent an employer innocent of coercion or interference from discussing labor policies and problems with his employees.[20]

§ 28(56). —— Pressure to Join Specific Union

An employer who coerces or forces an employee to join a specific union, at least in the absence of a valid closed-shop agreement with such union, is guilty of an unfair labor practice.

To coerce or force an employee to join a union, at least in the absence of a valid closed-shop or union-shop agreement with a lawful union, is to encourage membership therein and constitutes an unfair labor practice.[21] Accordingly, refusal to reinstate discharged employees until they joined a new union is an unfair labor practice,[22] since it is an interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees in the exercise of their statutory rights,[23] and it is discrimination with respect to hire or tenure of employment to encourage or discourage membership in a labor organization;[24] and offers of reinstatement conditioned on the discharged employees becoming members of a particular union or its successor are equivalent to an absolute refusal to reinstate.[25] An employer encouraging its employees' membership in a labor union by signing a collective bargaining contract therewith and discharging certain employees for not being members of, or having work permits from, such union, as required by the contract, has been held to be guilty of unfair labor practices prohibited by a state employment relations act.[26]

§ 28(57). —— Prohibiting Union Solicitation or Activity

An employer's rule prohibiting union solicitation during working hours is not objectionable as an unfair labor practice unless adopted for a discriminatory purpose; but rules prohibiting union solicitation by an employee outside of working hours on company property or prohibiting participation in organization activities of any kind on company time and property may constitute an unfair labor practice.

It is within the province of an employer to promulgate and enforce a rule prohibiting union solicitation during working hours,[27] and such a rule is not objectionable on its face as an unfair labor practice[28] but must be presumed to be valid in the absence of evidence that it was adopted for a discriminatory purpose.[29] A rule prohibiting union solicitation on company property or time, when construed by the employer as prohibiting all talk about unions and union activities, may, however, constitute an unfair labor practice.[30]

Ordinarily it is not within the province of an employer to promulgate and enforce a rule prohibiting union solicitation by an employee outside of working hours although on company property,[31] and the facts that the rule represented the considered judgment of management and was applied by employers generally, and that labor itself had recognized such a rule as valid, are not determinative of its validity.[32] Such a rule may constitute an unfair labor practice[33] and must be presumed to be an unreasonable impediment to self-organization and therefore discriminatory in the absence of evidence that special circumstances make the rule necessary in order to maintain production or discipline.[34] Denying an employee the right to distribute union literature at relatively the same spot and time as anti-union literature was distributed by business men of the community has been held to be an unfair labor practice.[35]

In determining whether an employer's rule is an unfair labor practice, the National Labor Relations Board is authorized to consider the manner in which and the purpose for which the rule was promulgated and employed.[36]

§ 28(58). —— Promotion, Demotion, or Transfer of Employees

An employer may promote, demote, transfer, or change the status of an employee unless he does so for a reason prohibited by statute.

Apart from statute it is the right of an employer to advance his employees on the basis of individual merit, without regard to their affiliation or nonaffiliation with any labor organization;[37] and the National Labor Relations Act does not attempt to regulate the employer's control of his business in the promotion of employees as long as the employer does not attempt thereby to interfere with the right of self-organization of the employees or to intimidate or coerce them.[38] So an employer may, notwithstanding the act, demote an employee for cause[39] unless it is for a reason prohibited by the act,[40] such as for union activity;[41] but membership or office in a union is not a guarantee against demotion.[42]

While the act does not interfere with the exercise of the normal right of an employer to transfer employees in the course of business,[43] the transfer of an employee,[44] or the change in status of an employee from permanent to temporary,[45] traceable to membership in a labor union or to activities on behalf of a bargaining agency, constitutes discrimination within the interdiction of the statute. The fact that the employer felt that the transfer was necessary to prevent his business from being disrupted does not justify the unfair practice.[46]

§ 28(59). —— Refusal to Grant Complete Recognition to Union as Sole Bargaining Agent

An employer who refuses to grant complete recognition of a union representing a majority of the employees as exclusive bargaining agent of all the employees or who places a limitation on the recognition granted may be guilty of an unfair labor practice.

An employer may be guilty of an unfair labor practice where he refuses to grant complete recognition of a union representing a majority of the employees as exclusive bargaining agent of all the employees[47] or places a limitation on the recognition granted,[48] as by recognizing the union as sole bargaining agency for those employees who are affiliated with the union,[49] notwithstanding the employer did in fact bargain with the union and the agreement reached as a result of such bargaining was in fact approved by its members;[50] nor is it material that the limited recognition granted was approved by members of the union[51] or that exclusive recognition was refused for fear that it would bring about reprisals by rival unions.[52] Where the union and employees have violated their contract with the employer, the employer's refusal to meet with the union's representatives does not constitute an unfair labor practice, since the National Labor Relations Act does not abrogate the correlative rights of the employer.[53] Where strikers, although acting as a group, are not the representatives of the

§ 28(60). —— Refusal to Sign Written Contract

Refusal of the employer to sign a written contract embodying the terms of an agreement reached with the union may constitute an unfair labor practice.

Refusal of the employer to sign a written contract embodying the terms of an agreement reached with the union may constitute an unfair labor practice[55] and so is an employer's intention, announced or determined on before negotiations are commenced, to refuse to sign such a written contract.[56]

Under some state statutes, where negotiations are pending and the employer and employees reach an oral agreement, the employer is not guilty of an unfair labor practice when he refuses to sign a written contract without consulting his counsel.[57]

§ 28(61). —— Shutdown and Lockout

While a bona fide shutdown of a plant does not of itself constitute a violation of the labor relations statutes, a shutdown or lockout of employees for the purpose of assisting, or discouraging membership in, a labor union constitutes an unfair labor practice.

The public policy of the state and nation is opposed to the closing or removal of factories in order to discourage, intimidate, and punish employees by removing hopes of reëmployment of such employees by the employer.[58] While a bona fide shutdown of a plant does not of itself constitute a violation of the labor relations statutes,[59] assistance given by an employer to a union by a shutdown, like other employer assistance, is forbidden by the National Labor Relations Act.[60] A shutdown or lockout of employees by an employer for the purpose of discouraging membership in a labor union constitutes a discrimination with respect to tenure or hire within the provision of the act making such discrimination an unfair labor practice,[61] as well as interference with, or restraint or coercion of, employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by the statute;[62] and a like rule applies where the shutdown has the additional purpose of compelling the employees to join a new union.[63]

§ 28(62). —— Wage Increases or Cuts; Deductions from Wages

An employer may be guilty of an unfair labor practice where he takes action with respect to wages, as by increasing them, without consulting a properly certified bargaining representative, or where he reduces wages because of union activity or to discourage bargaining regarding wages; but payroll deductions for union dues are not forbidden, at least where the union involved is not dominated by the employer.

Although the grant of a wage increase to employees does not necessarily constitute an unfair labor practice,[64] after a collective bargaining agent has been designated by the employees in an appropriate unit it may constitute an unfair labor practice for an employer to take unilateral action with respect to wages,[65] as, according to the decisions

Application to War Labor Board

(1) Employer's application to War Labor Board for wage increase for most of his employees, including small group having a properly certified bargaining representative which was not consulted by employer who disagreed with National Labor Relations Board's decision that such group was an appropriate bargaining unit, justified conclusion that under circumstances employer had engaged in an unfair labor prac-

on the question, by increasing them.[66] So it is an unfair labor practice for an employer, in response to an offer of his employees, to induce them by the grant of wage increases to leave their union,[67] and such practice is sufficient in itself to support an order of the labor relations board to cease and desist.[68] An employer who during a strike increases the salary of employees not striking but fails to increase the salaries of those on strike has been held to be guilty of improper interference with the exercise of the employees' right of self-organization in violation of a state statute.[69]

It constitutes an unfair labor practice for an employer to reduce the wages of his employees because of union activity,[70] to discourage any bargaining regarding wages,[71] or to reduce wages or job classifications of men without consulting a union with which he has entered into a collective bargaining contract relating to such matters.[72] An employer's refusal in good faith to agree to a union's interpretation of a collective bargaining contract entitling the employees under certain circumstances to double time does not constitute an unfair labor practice.[73] The termination of an arrangement voluntarily put into effect by the employer with respect to additional time off by employees does not necessarily constitute an unfair labor practice.[74] Under the Railway Labor Act no wage cut may be imposed unless provisions of the statute are first obeyed.[75]

Payroll deductions for union dues are not forbidden if made impartially.[76] The act of the employer in continuing his former practice of making payroll deductions for union dues of all employees on request, whether members of the bargaining representative or of rival unions, is not an unfair labor practice,[77] nor is it a refusal to bargain collectively with the bargaining representative.[78] Where deductions from wages were at the request of employees, made by the employer and paid over to a union dominated by the employer, the liability of the employer to the employees, if any, can, according to one view, be based only on the theory that the employer is liable in damages for the tort of compelling the members to contribute through the coercion of an unfair labor practice,[79] and the employer cannot be required by the National Labor Relations Board to reimburse the employees for such deductions[80] even in a case involving a closed shop;[81] but there is authority holding that the checkoff provision of a closed shop contract in such case is an unfair labor practice requiring reimbursement by the employer for the wages deducted.[82] Checkoff orders signed by union members directing

§ 28(63). Unfair Labor Practices of Employees, Labor Organizations, or Their Agents

Under some statutes it is an unfair labor practice for employees or labor organizations or their agents to perform specified acts.

Under some statutes it is an unfair labor practice for employees or labor organizations or their agents to perform specified forbidden acts.[84] Thus under some statutes picketing, boycotting, or the like, under conditions described in the statute, is made an unfair labor practice.[85] Such statutes do not forbid picketing but merely attempt to regulate it

(5) Temporary quitting of work by employees to attend union meetings with intent to resume work at the commencement of the next shift while the employer and union officials were attempting to negotiate a new union contract, under statute making it an unfair labor practice for employees individually or in concert with others to engage in any concerted effort to interfere with production except by leaving the premises in an orderly manner for the purpose of going on strike.—Amalgamated Local No. 806 of United Auto. (2) Picketing carried on to enforce union's demand that dairy company enter into an all-union contract although free from violence, where under statute company could not enter into such a contract unless three-fourths of its employees constituting a collective bargaining union voted therefor.—Wisconsin Employment Relations Board v. Milk & Ice Cream Drivers & Dairy Employees Union, Local No. 225, 299 N.W. 31, 238 Wis. 379, certiorari denied Milk & Ice Cream Drivers & Dairy Employees Union, Local No. 225, v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 62 S.Ct. 1035, 316 U.S. 668, 86 L.Ed. 1744.

Held not unfair labor practice

Where union had been duly recognized as exclusive bargaining representative of workers, and no appropriate action had been taken to terminate such relation, banner used by union in picketing employer which stated that employer had no contract with union and which requested public to refrain from patronizing employer did not constitute fraudulent advertising, and hence cease and desist order was improper, in absence of any evidence of interference with ingress to, or egress from, employer's premises or other oppressive misconduct in connection with the picketing.—Wisconsin Employment Relations Board v. International Ass'n of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers and Shopmen's Local No. 471, 6 N.W.2d 339, 241 Wis. 286, 144 A.L.R. 430.

Application of particular provisions

(1) The provisions of statute declaring it to be an unfair labor practice for an employee, individually or in concert with others, to coöperate in engaging in picketing or any other overt act concomitant of a strike unless a majority in a collective bargaining unit of employees of employer against whom such acts are directed have voted to call a strike do not apply to an individual and do not forbid an employee to quit his employment individually or in concert with others or forbid an employee, singly or in concert with others, from bringing about a vote by a collective bargaining unit as to whether there shall be a strike, and the provisions have no application except in case of an unauthorized strike.—Hotel and Restaurant Employees' International Alliance, Local No. 122 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 294 N.W. 632, 236 Wis. 329, rehearing denied 295 N.W. 634, 236 Wis. 329, affirmed 62 S.Ct. 706, 315 U.S. 437, 86 L.Ed. 946.

(2) If employees constituting a minority of a collective bargaining unit withdraw from employment, either singly or in concert, such employees are not guilty of an unfair labor practice within the statute; and to provide under what conditions picketing may be carried on by striking employees,[86] and one who violates the provisions of the statute has been held not to be guilty of a misdemeanor but his act is merely an unfair labor practice.[87] The picketing referred to in the statute is that kind of picketing with which the state has power to deal as a part of the power to preserve the peace and protect the privacy, lives, and property of its residents.[88] The failure of congress to define unfair labor practices of employees does not license employees, in the enforcement of their demands in a labor dispute, to commit acts of violence or coercion, or to do other things declared by the state statute to be unfair labor practices.[89]

§ 28(64). Prevention and Redress

a. By National Labor Relations Board
b. By state boards or agencies

a. By National Labor Relations Board

The National Labor Relations Board has power under the National Labor Relations Act to decide whether any unfair labor practices have been committed and to determine how they shall be corrected as well as to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting interstate or foreign commerce.

Under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, the National Labor Relations Board has initial power, which, prior to the amendment of the Act in 1947, was exclusive, to decide whether any unfair labor practices have been committed and to determine how they shall be corrected,[90] as well as to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting interstate or foreign commerce,[91] rather than merely to restrain the method by which such a practice is carried on in a particular case;[92] and this power may not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise.[93] This does not empower the board to deal with or to issue orders concerning unfair labor practices in general,[94] but extends only to unfair labor practices affecting commerce.[95] The

The board has authority to ascertain whether proscribed practices would in particular situations adversely affect commerce when judged by the full reach of the constitutional power of congress.—Polish Nat. Alliance of U. S. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 1196, 322 U.S. 643, 88 L.Ed. 1509.

Effect of agreement or other litigation on administrative proceedings generally see infra § 28 (70).

Arbitration agreement

The fact that employer's collective bargaining agreement with union contained a grievance and arbitration procedure for settlement of disputes did not preclude the board from taking jurisdiction in proceedings to determine whether employee's discharge was because of union activities.—N. L. R. B. v. Walt Disney Productions, C.C.A.9, 146 F. 2d 44, certiorari denied 65 S.Ct. 1025, 324 U.S. 877, 89 L.Ed. 1429.

power of the board includes the power to determine and prevent the employer from dominating, or interfering with the employees' right of self-organization.[96] The power or duty of the board extends to the prevention of the enjoyment of any advantage which the employer has gained by a violation of the statute,[97] and the board may determine whether any prior unfair labor practice has been committed and how the effect of the prior practice may be corrected,[98] and bar the resumption of such practice.[99]

The jurisdiction of the board to prevent such practices is very broad,[1] and the exercise of this jurisdiction in any particular case is discretionary with the board;[2] but the jurisdiction is not to be exercised unless the unfair practice complained of interferes so substantially with public rights created by the act as to require its restraint in the public interest.[3]

Prior to the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, otherwise known as the Taft-Hartley Act, § 8 (b), which amended the original act, and made it applicable to unfair labor practices on the part of a labor organization or its agents, it was held that the board's power of prevention applied only to unfair labor practices by employers which interfered with, restrained, or coerced employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed by the act,[4] and did not give the board jurisdiction to prevent acts of employees[5] or of members of a labor union,[6] and that if there was wrongdoing on both sides the board could prevent the employer wrongdoing prohibited by the act, even though it could not reach the other wrongdoing.[7]

b. By State Boards or Agencies

State boards have jurisdiction to enforce an unfair labor practice provision of a state statute unless the national board has taken jurisdiction or until it does so.

A state board has jurisdiction to enforce an unfair labor practice provision of a state statute identical with the provision of the national statute unless the National Labor Relations Board has taken

Unfair practice affecting commerce

(1) With respect to jurisdiction of board, newspaper publisher's unfair labor practices in discharging union employees because of strike, which directly resulted in cessation of interstate shipments of newspapers and materials and machinery used in publication thereof, directly affected interstate commerce within National Labor Relations Act, although publication of newspaper was intra-state activity.—N. L. R. B. v. Hearst, C.C.A.9, 102 F.2d 658.

(2) Where parties stipulated that employer between specified dates engaged in commerce, board could properly infer that commerce would not cease in following month and could assume jurisdiction over unfair labor practices beginning in such month.—N. Interference by supervising employees

Notwithstanding supervising employees apparently have no direct authority from their employer to participate in the organization activities of the employees so as to prejudice their rights of self-organization, the employer is subject to the board's power to prevent any repetition of such activities of the supervising employees and to remove the consequences of them on the other employees' rights of self-organization, to the same extent as though the employer had directed the supervising employees' acts.—H. J. Heinz Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

jurisdiction or until it does so,[8] and the fact that the national board assumed jurisdiction to supervise an election at which the employees chose the union as their bargaining agent does not deprive the state board of its jurisdiction.[9] So it has been held that the state board has jurisdiction under state statutes to prevent and redress unfair labor practices,[10] but, under some statutes, not to determine whether such practices exist in a particular case.[11] Where, however, the national board takes jurisdiction, the jurisdiction of the state board is ousted notwithstanding the identity in language of the two acts,[12] and the determination made by the national board is controlling.[13] Furthermore, where the state statute expressly prohibits the state board from dealing with any unfair labor practice subject to the national act, the state board has been held to have no authority with respect to any such unfair labor practice whether or not the national board has taken any action.[14]

4. LABOR RELATIONS BOARDS

§ 28(65). In General

A labor relations board, created by the various labor relations acts, is generally an administrative, fact-finding board or tribunal, with inquisitorial powers of a quasi-judicial character. It acts as a public agency in the interest of the public.

The adjustment of labor disputes, or settlement of other matters, arising under the various labor relations statutes, is usually vested in a labor relations board of an administrative nature.[15] Such a board is generally regarded as a fact-finding board

Loss of statutory benefits

Where a person pursues a course of conduct which under the state statute amounts to an unfair labor practice, such person is subject to statute under which he may, on complaint, be brought before the state board, and, when found guilty of an unfair labor practice, he loses benefit of statute prescribing what acts shall be legal in conduct of a labor dispute and is remitted to his rights under constitution, other statutes, and common law.—Hotel and Restaurant Employees' International Alliance, Local No. 122 v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Board, 294 N.W. 632, 236 Wis. 329, rehearing denied 295 N.W. 634, 236 Wis. 329, affirmed 62 S.Ct. 706, 315 U.S. 437, 86 L.Ed. 946.

Employer engaged in intra-state commerce

In proceeding before state board against employer because of unfair practices where employer admitted that it was engaged in intra-state commerce, the board had jurisdiction to hear the matter and to make cease and desist order if there was sufficient evidence of acts of defendant which would affect intra-state commerce.—Teamsters Local Union No. 222 v. Strevell-Paterson Hardware Co., Utah, 174 P.2d 164.

or tribunal, with inquisitorial powers in labor controversies.[16] It is generally regarded as quasi-judicial in character,[17] but without judicial power as a court, in a strict sense.[18] It is a public agency acting in the public interest, to protect the public from unfair labor practices described in the act.[19]

The National Labor Relations Board, as created by the National Labor Relations Act of July 5th, 1935, c 372 § 3, 29 U.S.C.A. § 153 et seq, is a "public agency,"[20] with judicial, as well as administrative, functions,[21] and as such is responsible, within the limits of the powers granted to it, for the performance of its public functions in the public interest.[22] Since the purpose of the act is to eliminate obstructions to commerce, the board must also be treated as having a constitutional function.[23] It is an entity distinct from its members,[24] and has a seal;[25] and, although not expressly made a corporation,[26] it is a body corporate with capacity to be party plaintiff or defendant in federal courts, in so far as the act gives the right of suit.[27]

The function of the National Labor Relations Board is to administer the National Labor Relations Act,[28] and to effectuate the declared policy of such act;[29] but this does not mean that the board may wholly ignore other and equally important congressional objectives.[30] Its powers may be asserted or invoked only where there is a public right to be protected,[31] such as to secure to employees their rights under the act and to remove the effects of any unlawful conduct by the employer.[32] Its powers may not be asserted or invoked for the adjudication or protection of private rights, or the redress of private wrongs.[33]

§ 28(66). Powers and Duties

a. In general
b. Managerial or supervisory powers

a. In General

A labor relations board has only the powers and duties which are conferred on it by the statute which created it, and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry them into effect.

A labor relations board may exercise only such powers, and is subject to only such duties, as are conferred on or prescribed to it, by the labor relations act, which created it,[34] together with such incidental powers as are reasonably necessary to enable it to carry into effect the powers and duties expressly conferred or prescribed.[35] The board is generally given the power to hear and initially determine and adjudge labor disputes,[36] and, usually, it has no equitable powers.[37] Under some statutes, the board has no power to enforce or abrogate a contract between an employer and a trade union,[38] particularly where the board is not a party to the contract;[39] and it may be prohibited from investigating controversies between members of the same parent labor organization or union.[40]

National labor relations board. Every power is conferred on the National Labor Relations Board which is essential to the exercise of the powers granted, or to the performance of the duties imposed, by the National Labor Relations Act,[41] and the power of the board to settle a controversy by administrative action carries with it the responsibility to act.[42] The board has no power to adjudicate the validity or effect of existing contracts between employer and individual employees,[43] except as to their effect on matters within the board's jurisdiction.[44]

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 4, 29 U.S.C.A. § 154, the National Labor Relations Board may appoint various agents or assistants, including attorneys who at its direction may appear for and represent the board in a case in court.[45] It has supervisory powers over such agents,[46] and may prevent obstructive tactics on their part.[47]

Railroad Adjustment Board. The powers conferred on the National Railroad Adjustment Board by the Railway Labor Act are advisory only,[48] with no coercive effect other than the sanction and force of publicity and public opinion.[49]

b. Managerial or Supervisory Powers

A labor relations board has no managerial or supervisory powers over the conduct of an employer's business.

A labor relations board, such as the National Labor Relations Board, has no managerial or supervisory powers over the conduct of an employer's business.[50] It may not substitute its own judgment, or ideas of discipline and management, for those of the employer,[51] or supervise and control employee and employer relations;[52] nor has it power to police collective bargaining contracts between employers and labor organizations.[53] It has been held that a labor board has no power to compel employees to work, where they undertake to strike in breach of a covenant not to do so;[54] nor has it authority to prevent the stockholders of a corporation employer, against which a judgment for affirmative action has been entered under the act, from dissolving and reorganizing the corporation.[55]

§ 28(67). Exercise of Powers in General

A labor relations board generally is granted a wide discretion; but it must act impartially and conform to the standards established by the statute under which it acts. Action by a majority of the members of the board is generally sufficient.

A labor relations board is generally granted a wide discretion in the exercise of its powers in administering the statute,[56] but it must deal fairly with all the parties to the controversy,[57] and must conform to the standards established by the labor relations statute under which it acts,[58] and the board must see that the statute is fairly applied,[59] and not brought into disrepute by unlawful or palpably unjust applications of it.[60]

portunity to act;[62] and, where a majority of such members concur in the decision and order, it is as binding as the act of the full board, and must be viewed as if all of such members had approved it.[63]

Principal office of board. Under the express provisions of the National Labor Relations Act § 5, 29 U.S.C.A. § 155, the principal office of the National Labor Relations Board is located in the District of Columbia,[64] although it may meet and exercise its powers at any other place.[65]

§ 28(68). Rules and Regulations

A labor relations board generally is vested with power to establish such rules and regulations as may be reasonably necessary to enable it properly to perform its functions, and to make changes in such rules from time to time.

A labor relations board is usually vested with the power of establishing such rules and regulations as are reasonably necessary to enable it properly to perform its functions,[66] and is also vested with the power of changing such rules from time to time.[67]

Under the express provisions of the National Labor Relations Act § 6 (a), 29 U.S.C.A. § 156, the National Labor Relations Board has power to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act. The board, in dealing with various situations under the act, may, in the sound exercise of its discretion, establish and apply general rules and principles,[68] subject only to their appropriateness to effectuate the purposes of the act,[69] and to their reasonableness with relation to all the rights involved.[70] Likewise, the board has power to suspend its rules.[71] The board also has the right to construe its own rules,[72] unless such construction is so arbitrary as to result in the denial of substantial justice.[73] The board, however, cannot, by its own rules and regulations, confer on itself jurisdiction which it does not have under the statute creating it.[74]

Under the Railway Labor Act § 2, 45 U.S.C.A. § 152, the National Mediation Board has authority to interpret its own rules[75] and to amend or set them aside in its own discretion.[76]

Settlement agreements

The rule adopted by the board, that it will ordinarily respect the terms of a settlement agreement approved by it, but that it will go behind such agreements where subsequent events demonstrate that efforts for adjustment had failed to accomplish their purpose or where there has been a subsequent unfair labor practice, is appropriate to accomplish the purpose of the act with fairness to all concerned.—Wallace Corporation v. 5. Procedure for Settlement of Disputes

a. IN GENERAL

§ 28(69). Administrative Proceedings

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act; Communications Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act

a. In General

The appropriate initial remedy for the adjustment of a labor dispute, or the enforcement of a right, arising under the various labor relations acts, usually is by an administrative proceeding before the labor relations board created by the statute.

The appropriate initial remedy for the adjustment of a labor dispute, or the enforcement of a right, arising under the various labor relations acts, usually is by an administrative proceeding before the labor relations board created by the statute,[77] and, as discussed infra § 28 (71), as a general rule resort may not be had to the courts until the administrative remedies have been exhausted. Such an administrative proceeding has been held to be the proper remedy for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes between rival labor groups;[78] and, under some statutes, an administrative proceeding before the board is the exclusive remedy for the redress of wrongs arising from the relation of employer and employee.[79]

Administrative procedure before a labor relations board is generally simple, informal, and direct,[80] and, while the processes of adjudication and litigation should be within the limits and requirements of the provisions of the labor statute,[81] the strictness of technical procedure with which judicial proceedings are surrounded is relaxed.[82] The board is generally allowed a wide discretion or latitude in procedural details,[83] although it must conform to standards of fairness and reasonableness.[84]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act; Communications Act

Under the National Labor Relations Act, and Communications Act, an administrative proceeding before the National Labor Relations Board is the proper and exclusive initial remedy for a violation of the act.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, the proper and exclusive initial remedy for a violation of the act is by an administrative proceeding before the National Labor Relations Board;[85] and the proce-

Improper practice or procedure
A practice or procedure of the Na-

dure set forth in such act is the full measure of the remedies available to a union for a violation of the right of collective bargaining.[86]

The National Labor Relations Board may fashion its procedure so as to achieve the purposes of the act to afford protection from unfair labor practices,[87] and a court cannot, by incorporating the judicial concept of estoppel into the procedure of the board, render it powerless to prevent an obvious frustration of the purposes of the act.[88] A proceeding before a board is not an action at law;[89] nor is it a litigation between private parties.[90] It is neither punitive nor compensatory,[91] but is preventative and remedial to implement a public economic policy, and promote public welfare.[92]

Under the Communications Act, of 1934 § 222, subs. (f) (10), 47 U.S.C.A. § 222 (f) (10), relating to the enforcement of rights granted by such act to employees of merged telegraph carriers, such employees have the same remedies as has an employee complaining of unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act,[93] and an application to the National Labor Relations Board is the primary and exclusive remedy of an employee complaining of a reduction in compensation[94] or of an assignment to work inconsistent with his training and experience.[95]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

Under the Railway Labor Act, a complaining carrier or employee may have his rights either determined in a court or settled by the administrative remedies provided by the statute.

Although the National Railroad Adjustment Board has the power to function, under The Railway Labor Act, without being interfered with by the courts,[96] the provisions of such act for the submission of labor disputes relating to contract rights to the adjustment board do not provide an exclusive remedy or tribunal for the adjustment of such rights.[97] The complaining carrier or employee may elect whether to have his grievances or rights determined by a court or settled by the administrative remedies prescribed by the statute,[98] but, if the lat-tional Labor Relations Board, no matter how uniformly and long continued, cannot be made a lawful practice or procedure, unless it is within the scope and intent of the National Labor Relations Act from which, and only from which, the board derives its power.—Brotherhood and Union of Transit Emps. of Baltimore v. Election made

Where a dispute arises between a carrier and employees regarding a collective agreement, a choice regarding the remedy is made not only when the carrier submits or joins in submitting dispute to the National Railway Adjustment Board but when, under submission by an employee, the carrier appears before the board and participates in full hearing on the merits.—Washington Terminal Co. v. Boswell, 124 F.2d 235, 76 U.S.App.D.C. 1, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 1430, 319 U.S. 732, 87 L.Ed. 1694.

Co. v. Order of Ry. Conductors of America, D.C.S.C., 63 F.Supp. 306.

ter remedy is selected, it must be followed through to the conclusion prescribed.[99]

Under the Federal Transportation Act of Febr. 28, 1920, 41 U.S.St. at L. tit III § 301, et seq, now repealed, a dispute between a railroad company, engaged in interstate commerce, and its employees could be settled by an administrative proceeding before the labor board, created by the act.[1] It was within the province and lawful power of the board to determine the existence of the jurisdictional facts on which its right to function exists.[2] A dispute between carriers and employees, although existing before the enactment of the statute, was none the less one cognizable by the board, if continuing to exist after the board began to function.[3] Where a dispute came before the board as to wages and working conditions cognizable by it, and had been so treated by the parties thereto, it was immaterial, as regards the board's jurisdiction, whether the dispute came before the board by ex parte or joint submission or on the board's initiative.[4] The labor board did not lose jurisdiction of such a dispute pending before it by requesting the parties to confer and if possible to agree thereon.[5] The board could not be ousted over a dispute as to rules and working conditions between carriers and employees, pending before it, either by a carrier promulgating on its own motion new rules and working conditions, or by notice of the association of railway executives to labor organizations that it had made recommendation to the member roads that negotiations be handled by the management and employees of each road.[6]

§ 28(70). —— Effect of Agreement or Other Litigation

An administrative proceeding, under a labor relations statute, generally may not be affected by any private agreement between the employer and the employees, or by any litigation between them with respect to private rights.

An administrative proceeding under a labor relations statute, such as with respect to unfair labor practices, may not be affected by any private agreement between the employer and the employees,[7] or between the employer and the union,[8] or by any litigation between them for the vindication of private rights.[9] Where a union, controlling the defense of the employer's action against employees, and the employees named as defendants therein, are not parties to a subsequent proceeding before the labor board, although their interest will be directly affected by its outcome, the rule of res judicata does not govern in a strict sense,[10] although the public policy on which the rule is based may place some limit on the scope of the board's investigation and the effect of its decision.[11] A labor relations board is not precluded by any principle of res judicata or estoppel, or by public policy, from investigating in public interest the facts involved in a labor dispute.[12] A pending proceeding before a state board, charging the illegality of a strike, does not preclude the National Labor Relations Board from proceeding

Agreement as to interpretation of rules and contracts

An agreement between an order of railway conductors and a railway company that the order's general committee should represent the members in making and interpreting contracts, rates, rules, and working agreements does not nullify the statutory provisions as to steps in handling disputes after the failure of conferences between such committee and the company's management, or prevent the use of other contractual and statutory agencies for the settlement of such controversies.—Myers v. against the employer for a violation of the National Labor Relations Act.[13] It has been held, however, that an application to such board for relief, as for unfair labor practices, cannot be made while negotiations between the parties, as for collective bargaining, is still pending.[14]

§ 28(71). Judicial Remedies

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act

a. In General

(a) Resort to court in general
(b) Action for breach of contract

(a) Resort to Court in General

Under some labor relations statutes resort may not be had to the courts until all of the administrative remedies have been exhausted, except to the extent that jurisdiction has been conferred on the courts by statute, and except as to disputes and matters which are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the labor relations board.

Under some labor relations statutes, until all of the administrative remedies with respect to the adjustment or settlement of labor disputes have been exhausted, resort may not be had to the courts,[15] except to the extent that jurisdiction has been conferred on the courts by the statute,[16] except as to disputes or matters which are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the board,[17] or except where the person aggrieved is without adequate administrative remedy before the board.[18]

A court of equity, ordinarily, has no power to interfere to maintain an employee in his position pending the disposition by the state labor relations board of an unfair labor practice charge, filed in the employee's behalf by his labor union,[19] and may not interfere to maintain such employee in an apartment occupied by him in the employer's multiple dwelling as an incident of his compensation or salary,[20] unless there is a showing of irreparable damage.[21] A court of equity also will not interfere with, or invalidate, a decision of a labor federation, with its internal organization, or with the method of its making or enforcing its awards, if all the parties have had an opportunity to be heard, the decision has not been arbitrary, and the fundamental law of the association has not been violated.[22] A bill in equity, however, has been held to be a proper remedy for the reinstatement of an employee and damages, on the basis of an individual contract with the employer granting seniority rights, at least where an action at law would be inadequate.[23]

Where a contract between a railroad company and a union provides for the submission of the whole subject matter of a labor dispute to arbitration by

Negotiations held not pending

A statement by the employer's superintendent to a representative of the National Labor Relations Board that he had already rejected a proposed contract and would waste no time in reviewing it, and that he was under no duty to offer proposals, precludes a contention that the board could not consider the union's application for relief because the negotiations were still pending.—Inland Lime & Stone Co. v. New union

In such a case, an employee seeking reinstatement of seniority rights, established by an individual contract of employment and confirmed by a collective bargaining agreement between the employer and a former union, is not required, before suing for equitable relief, to resort to the tribunals of a new union which thereafter executes a new collective agreement, establishing different seniority rights, particularly where it does not appear that he has ever been a member of that union.—Madera v. Monongahela Ry. Co., supra.

the railroad adjustment board, such course should be pursued before resort to the courts.[24]

(b) Action for Breach of Contract

An employee coming under the provisions of a contract between the employer and a labor union has a right of action at law for the redress of his wrongs arising out of a breach of such contract. An action for breach of contract may also be maintained by or against a labor union.

An employee coming under the provisions of a contract between the employer and a labor union has a right of action at law for the redress of his wrongs or grievances, arising out of a breach of such contract,[25] although he is not a party to the contract, except to the extent that he is made a party thereto by its being made for his benefit.[26] He may sue for damages for a failure to respect his seniority rights, by demoting him,[27] even though he continues to work after his seniority has been reduced.[28]

An employee has a right of action for damages for a wrongful discharge under a contract, which covers him, between the employer and union,[29] although he has not agreed to work for the employer for any definite length of time.[30] He may sue for a wrongful discharge, where, in violation of the terms of the contract, he is discharged without a fair hearing or investigation,[31] even though he has not requested such a hearing, where, under the terms of the working agreement, it was not incumbent on him to make such a request;[32] but he is not entitled to recover

Labor board's award
An employee's action for a breach of contract of employment, in which the labor board's award, authorizing the employee's recovery of wages for time lost, if accepted as final, is not an action to enforce the board's decision as such, but is one for breach of the contract.—San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Collins, Tex., 61 S.W.2d 84.

Rights are governed by terms of contract
U.S.—System Federation No. 59 of Railway Employees Department of American Federation of Labor v. Louisiana & A. Ry. Co., C.C.A.La., 119 F.2d 509, rehearing denied 32 F.Supp. 89, certiorari denied 62 S. Ct. 108, 314 U.S. 626, 86 L.Ed. 526.

What law governs
The law of the state in which a railroad employee was employed for work therein, in which the collective bargaining agreement on which he relies was executed, and in which the breach, if any, occurred, governs such employee's action for a wrongful discharge.—Elder v. An employee who has automatically lost his seniority rights, under the terms of his contract of employment, by his voluntary transfer to another department, is not entitled to maintain an action for breach of contract after having been laid off without regard to seniority.—Florestano v. Compliance with contract
An employee who receives notice of his discharge, in compliance with the provisions of the contract between his employer and the union of which he is a member, is not entitled to maintain an action for a wrongful discharge, regardless of whether the motive for giving the notice was to abrogate the contract with the union.—Volquardsen v. Southern Amusement Co., La.App., 156 So. 678.

If wrongfully discharged before end of term, he may sue immediately for breach of contract.—Gary v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 141 S.E. 819, 37 Ga.App. 744.

Prevention of performance of conditions
An employer, who refuses to do the acts required of it by the contract of employment relating to the settlement of disputes arising out of the discharge of an employee, and prevents the discharged employee from complying with such provisions, may not urge as a defense to the discharged employee's action for breach of the contract the fact that the employee had failed to comply with such provisions.—Moore County Carbon Co. v. Whitten, Tex.Civ.App., 140 S.W.2d 880, error dismissed, judgment correct.

An engineman is not estopped to complain of his discharge by railroad because of his failure to request hearing, where it was not incumbent on engineman under working agreement with railroad to request hearing, but it was incumbent on rail-damages for a delay in rendering a decision of discharge after the investigation, if he suffers no damage as result of such delay.[33] The fact that an employee's discharge was found justified after an investigation by a delegate of the union may be urged as a defense to the discharged employee's action for breach of his contract of employment, where the contract provides that the employee shall have no recourse if his discharge is found justified by such investigation.[34]

An employee, who has been lawfully laid off, may have a cause of action for damages for a breach of the employer's obligation to reëmploy him, in accordance with the terms of the contract,[35] such as for a refusal to reëmploy him according to his seniority standing,[36] unless such rights are not preserved;[37] and each day that he is not reëmployed, in accordance with the contract, constitutes a separate violation, and gives rise to a distinct cause of action, for which a new action may be brought.[38]

By or against union. A labor union, although unincorporated, may maintain an action to enforce the provisions of a contract entered into by it with an employer, when the employer has breached or is threatening a breach of some provision which is deemed by the courts of consequence to the union as an organization, and where an action by an individual member of the union would not lie.[39] It has been held that an action will lie by the union to prevent the breach of an agreement for a closed shop,[40] or for a breach of agreement with respect to keeping the employer's shop or store open after the hours agreed on.[41] An action for damages may also be maintained against a union for a violation of its collective bargaining contract,[42] for damages sustained by an employer as a result of an unlawful strike,[43] or as a result of the unlawful conduct thereof;[44] for damages resulting from a strike against an employer with whom no trade dispute exists;[45] for damages sustained by one as a result of an unlawful boycott conducted by a union;[46] or for damages sustained by one as a result of unlawful picketing.[47]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

Under the National Labor Relations Act, as a general rule, resort may not be had to the courts, until the administrative remedies before the National Labor Relations Board have been exhausted.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, resort may be had to the courts, for violations of the act, only where the administrative remedies before the National Labor Relations Board have been exhausted,[48] and this rule cannot be circumvented by asserting that the charge on which the complaint rests is groundless, and that the mere holding of an administrative hearing would result in irreparable damage.[49] Until the administrative remedy has been exhausted, a person aggrieved cannot apply for relief in equity,[50] such as for injunctive relief, as discussed in Injunctions § 138 b (2) (a) dd. A state court, however, may enforce against a labor union such rights as are consistent with the provisions of the act;[51] and such act does not deprive a state court of the power to prevent unlawful conduct by labor unions, where such conduct is not authorized or protected by the act.[52]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

Under the Railway Labor Act, resort may be had to the courts for the redress of wrongs, or for the establishment and enforcement of rights, without exhausting administrative remedies.

The Railway Labor Act does not deprive employees of the right to resort to law tribunals for the redress of wrongs,[53] and does not require that the administrative remedies before the board shall be resorted to, or exhausted, by the complaining carrier or employees, before bringing an action in court to redress grievances, or to establish and enforce rights, under the statute,[54] such as to establish and enforce an employee's seniority rights under a collective bargaining contract.[55] If the dispute or grievance is first taken before a court, it will retain jurisdiction and carry the case through to an adjudication.[56]

Procedure before board not compulsory

Neither the original Railway Labor Act of 1926 nor the act as amended in 1934 indicates that the machinery provided for settling disputes between employees and carriers growing out of grievances or out of interpretation of agreements concerning rates of pay, etc., was based on the philosophy of legal compulsion.

Tex.—Watson v. Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. of Texas, Civ.App., 173 S.W.2d 357.

State courts

The provision of the Railway Labor Act, which permits controversies arising under employment contracts to be determined before the National Railroad Adjustment Board, does not deprive state courts of jurisdiction.—Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Slocum, 57 N.Y.S.2d 65, 269 App.Div. 467.

56. U.S.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Order of Ry. Conductors of America, D. C.S.C., 63 F.Supp. 306.

Employees having individual grievances are without adequate administrative remedy, and may seek relief in equity without first attempting to obtain relief by administrative means,[57] such as for a breach of duty by a bargaining representative toward a member of the craft represented and a discriminatory contract between such representative and the carriers.[58] If the contract of employment provides that the federal board of mediation is the final tribunal to which a discharged employee may appeal for a determination of his grievances, and a reinstatement if the decision of such tribunal favors him, the failure of such board to reach an adjustment does not give the employee a cause of action, where a number of prior tribunals had found against him.[59]

Jurisdictional disputes. The courts, under the Railway Labor Act, have no jurisdiction of a jurisdictional dispute or controversy between two rival unions,[60] but a union in such a case must have its contract construed by the adjustment board, and then seek relief in a court of equity to protect its rights under the contract as so interpreted.[61]

The Federal Transportation Act of Febr. 28, 1920, 41 U.S.St. at L. tit III § 301 et seq, now repealed, providing for the settlement, by administrative proceedings, of disputes between a railroad, engaged in interstate commerce, and its employees, did not disturb the jurisdiction of state courts of a controversy over contract rights between two employees and a carrier, where all parties were residents of the state and no question of interstate commerce was involved.[62] In the absence of a request to refer a dispute to the labor board as provided by the act, the statute did not take away the right of an individual employee first to resort to the courts to adjudicate his rights,[63] and in order to abate such a suit, a request of the railroad to refer the matter to the labor board must have been alleged and proved and the claims shown to be within its jurisdiction.[64]

§ 28(72). Arbitration

The right to arbitration and the particular matters or disputes which may be arbitrated depend on the provisions of the statute, or of the arbitration clause of the employment contract, under which arbitration is sought.

The arbitration of disputes between employers and employees is strongly supported by a sound and well recognized public policy.[65] The right to arbitration[66] and the particular disputes which may be arbitrated depend on the terms of the statute,[67] or the terms of the arbitration clause of the employment contract,[68] under which arbitration is sought. Under an arbitration clause in a collective bargaining contract, such disputes only may be arbitrated as come within the provisions of the clause;[69] and the willingness of the employer to recognize a matter not in the agreement, in a particular instance, does not constitute an agreement on his part that anything not in the agreement might be made the subject of arbitration.[70] The particular matters arbitrable, under such clause, may be determined by the practical construction of the clause by the parties to the contract,[71] and, if the interpretation so given is a reasonable one, the employer may not subsequently assert that the controversy submitted was not within the arbitration clause.[72] A blanket arbitration clause, covering all disputes, applies to a dispute, although it is not mentioned in the contract,[73] and the fact that a claim sought to be arbitrated appears to be contrary to the language of the contract is not sufficient to authorize the substitution of a court's determination as to the merits of the claim for that of the arbitrators.[74] Under a contract providing that, if it is impossible to reach a satisfactory understanding as to an employee's complaint or grievance by procedure before the successive tribunals provided for in the agreement, the question in dispute shall be submitted to a board of arbitrators, the only matters that may be so arbitrated are those relating to individual complaints and grievances,[75] and not matters relating to amendments to, or modifications of, the contract;[76] and, where the contract provides that there should be no modification thereof, during the term of the agreement, an employee is not entitled to arbitration of

Seniority standing

When an employee's seniority standing was required by collective bargaining contract, and seniority list posted by employer in accordance with terms of the contract became a part thereof, such employee's seniority was not arbitrable under the contract which provided for arbitration of an employee's complaint or grievance, but not for matters relating to amendments to or modifications of the contract.—Texoma Natural Gas Co. v. disputes, which, if submitted to arbitration, would in effect create a new contract.[77] Although the contract makes the state compensation act applicable to the employee's injury or death, if the arbitration clause refers only to disputes between the employer and employee, it is inapplicable in an action by the employee's widow on the contract.[78]

An employer may be required to proceed to arbitration, in accordance with a collective bargaining contract, containing an arbitration clause,[79] unless he signed the contract under duress;[80] and, where an arbitration has been had, the employer may not question the validity of the contract to arbitrate.[81]

An arbitration clause in a collective bargaining contract does not establish an agreement for statutory arbitration, if there is no attempt to limit the arbitration to controversies which might be the subject of a personal action at law or a suit in equity, and no court is designated to which any award is to be returned;[82] but a proviso excluding statutory arbitrations as to contracts for personal services has been held not to preclude such an arbitration with reference to a dispute growing out of a collective bargaining agreement.[83]

§ 28(73). —— Procedure

The arbitration of a dispute between an employer and a labor union should comply with the requirements of the arbitration clause of the contract, or of the provisions of the statute, under which it is conducted.

The arbitration of a controversy or dispute between an employer and a labor union, in pursuance of an arbitration clause in the contract between them, providing for the settlement of future controversies, or in pursuance of the provisions of an arbitration statute, should be conducted in accordance with the requirements of the contract,[84] or statute,[85] as the case may be, such as with respect to the time within which a demand or notice for arbitration must be made, unless such requirement is waived.[86] If such a contract contains no formal requirements as to the certification of disputes, the submission to arbitration thereunder is not required to be in writing subscribed by the parties;[87] but the contrary obtains where the submission is under a statute which requires such formality.[88] A provision of such a contract, which gives the arbitrator power to render decisions as to the meaning, application, or interpretation of the agreement, does not vest in the arbitrator authority to issue a directive to the employer,[89] but he may make such a directive if he is expressly vested with such authority by the contract.[90] In a proceeding for a stay of arbitration proceedings instituted by a local union before an arbitration association, the court may enter an order appointing an arbitrator and directing arbitration under the contract entered into between the parties, notwithstanding such relief is not specifically requested.[91] If one of the parties agrees that the award should be made by certain designated persons, he thereby waives objection to any apparent bias.[92]

Under the Railway Labor Act § 157, if a controversy between a carrier and its employees is not settled either by a conference between the representatives of the parties, or by the appropriate adjustment board or through mediation, it may be submitted to a proper board for arbitration.[93] This arbitration is voluntary, and not mandatory,[94] and a failure to arbitrate does not bar a legal action.[95]

Under a general arbitration statute, it has been held that, where in proceedings involving an agreement between a workers' union and an employers' association, defendant employer raises the issue as to whether he is a party to the agreement, under which the arbitration is to be conducted, the arbitrator may not determine his own jurisdiction and status by finding that the employer is bound by the contract,[96] but, where a jury trial has been waived, the court is required to determine the preliminary question,[97] and, if it refuses to make the initial determination whether the employer is a party to the arbitration agreement before the submission of the controversy to the arbitrator, the arbitration proceedings are fatally defective.[98] Where the submission is made in accordance with the agreement of the parties, it has been held not to be invalid because of a failure to conform to the arbitration statute.[99]

Appointment and removal of arbitrator. An arbitrator appointed by the court to adjust and settle a controversy, arising out of a labor dispute, such as a strike, must have the proper qualifications and ability for the performance of such duties,[1] and the removal of an arbitrator, so appointed, is within the discretion of the court.[2] It is not sufficient to justify his appointment that he possess honesty and integrity, if he has evinced a course of conduct showing an ardor of advocacy for the cause of labor;[3] and, where such fact is established, the court, which appointed the arbitrator, may declare the office of arbitration vacant and appoint a successor arbitrator, on the motion of the employer.[4]

Common-law arbitration. Under an agreement between a union and an employers' association which on behalf of its members agrees to submit disputes thereunder to an impartial chairman, the union may compel an employer member which has breached the agreement to submit to a common-law arbitration.[5] Where an agreement between a union and an employer expressly grants to each employee the right to have arbitrated the question whether, by being discharged, he was unjustly discriminated against, a discharged employee, as a third party beneficiary, may maintain a proceeding to require the employer to arbitrate the question of discrimination,[6] and, unless required by statute, he is not required to deposit security for costs as a condition of obtaining an order against the employer directing arbitration.[7]

§ 28(74). Jurisdiction

a. In general
b. Under National Labor Relations Act
c. Under Railway Labor Act

a. In General

Jurisdiction to adjust controversies arising under the various labor relations acts is generally vested, in the first instance, in a labor relations board or commission, created by the statute.

Jurisdiction to adjust a labor dispute, or enforce a right, arising under the various labor relations acts is generally vested, in the first instance, in a labor relations board or commission.[8] A state labor board has been held to have jurisdiction of a case dealing with a resident employer and resident employees, for a violation of the state statute,[9] notwithstanding the employer also has employees residing outside the state.[10] A labor board, which has no jurisdiction to proceed further with a complaint than to decide that it has no jurisdiction of the subject matter has jurisdiction to make that decision.[11]

Exclusiveness. Unless otherwise provided by the statute, the jurisdiction of such board, within the limits of the powers conferred on it, is generally exclusive,[12] and the exercise of its powers, under such jurisdiction, is not subject to the action of the courts,[13] except, as discussed infra § 28 (122), for and in enforcing its orders or for a review of such orders. It has been held that a state labor board does not have exclusive jurisdiction over a contract between a trade union and an employer, adjusting a controversy over charges of unfair labor practices by the employer,[14] as against the jurisdiction of the proper court to afford full protection to the parties to the contract,[15] and that to give exclusive jurisdiction of the board in such a case would be against public policy.[16]

b. Under National Labor Relations Act

Under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, the National Labor Relations Board has jurisdiction, unaffected by state statutes or decisions, or by private agreements, over all labor disputes affecting interstate commerce. Within the limits of the act, this jurisdiction is generally exclusive, as against the courts and state labor relations boards.

The National Labor Relations Act establishes a general and uniform jurisdiction over labor relations in the National Labor Relations Board,[17] and this jurisdiction may not be varied or denied by state statutes[18] or decisions[19] or by an agreement between private parties.[20] The jurisdiction of the board over a labor dispute depends on the facts existing at the time of the dispute,[21] and continues as long as the relation of employer and employee continues.[22] It may take jurisdiction of a dispute, notwithstanding the dispute originated prior to the passage of the statute, if the board's action is based on acts which occurred after the effective date of the statute.[23] Any objection to the jurisdiction of the board should, in the first instance, be addressed to the board.[24]

Elements of jurisdiction; interstate commerce. The jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board attaches, and is restricted, to labor disputes affecting interstate commerce,[25] since the National Labor Relations Act applies only to such commerce, "Commerce," as defined in National Labor Relations Act § 2, 29 U.S.C.A. § 152, extending jurisdiction of National Labor Relations Board only to unfair labor practices affecting commerce, aside from that in a territory or District of Columbia, is interstate and foreign commerce in the constitutional sense.—N. L. R. B. v. Idaho-Maryland Mines Corp., C.C. A.9, 98 F.2d 129.

Utility's interstate business
Where unitary character of utility's business had resulted in organization of a single association of its employees, and strife affecting interstate commerce would be avoided as discussed supra § 28 (2) b. It is the duty of the board, at the beginning of a proceeding before it, to decide whether the dispute is one which affects commerce,[26] and it is error for the board to fail to make such decision on the ground that the facts were not sufficiently developed and then deny a petition for leave to adduce additional evidence.[27] The board's jurisdiction, however, is not limited to cases in which the labor disputes, strikes, or lockouts in question have the necessary effect of impairing, burdening, or obstructing commerce, but may attach where there is a reasonable probability of interference with interstate commerce;[28] but if the case is one in which the employer is not itself engaged in interstate commerce, justification for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the board, because of intra-state activities, should clearly appear.[29] No restrictions on the board's jurisdiction are to be determined or fixed exclusively by reference to the volume of interstate commerce involved, except in so far as the maxim de minimis applies.[30]

Jurisdictional disputes. It has been held that a jurisdictional dispute between members of the same labor organization must be decided by such organization, and not by the National Labor Relations Board.[31]

Exclusiveness of jurisdiction. Except as otherwise provided by statute, the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board with respect to hearing and determining labor disputes, to the extent that such jurisdiction is conferred on it by the National Labor Relations Act, is generally exclusive,[32] and an order of the board deprives a state court of jurisdiction as to the same subject matter.[33] Where, however, the dispute is essentially one between the members of a labor union and certain individual workers, and the employer is made a party solely only if rights of all employees were properly safeguarded, the gas and transportation businesses of the utility as well as its interstate electrical business were subject to jurisdiction of the board.—Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 115 F.2d 414, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 344, 314 U.S. 469, 86 L.Ed. 348.

Jurisdiction sustained by findings

The board has jurisdiction of proceeding if any of its findings concerning effect of labor dispute on interstate commerce is sustained by substantial evidence.—N. L. R. B. v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 780.

Pa.—Pittsburgh Rys. Co. Substation Operators and Maintenance Employees Case, 54 A.2d 891, 357 Pa. 379.

Actual stoppage or impairment of commerce is not required, but once the practices which congress has declared as having necessary effect of impairing, burdening, or obstructing commerce are shown to take place in an industry whose products enter interstate commerce in substantial degree, the board is empowered to correct them.—N. L. R. B. v. American Potash & Chemical Corporation, C.C.A.9, 98 F.2d 488, certiorari denied American Potash & Chemical Corporation v. N. L. R. B., 59 S.Ct. 582, 306 U.S. 643, 83 L.Ed. 1043.

Industries within rule

Jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board extends not merely to those industries directly engaged in interstate commerce or in production or manufacture of goods destined to use interstate channels for distribution, but also to those which, admittedly local and intra-state, have a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce and whose regulation is necessary to maintain conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted without hinderance.—Pittsburgh Rys. Co. Substation Operators and Maintenance Employees Case, 54 A.2d 891, 357 Pa. 379.

29. Pa.—Pittsburgh Rys. Co. Substation Operators and Maintenance Employees Case, supra.

Propriety of exercise of jurisdiction

Where employers are not themselves engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, and the authority of the National Labor Relations Board is invoked to protect that commerce from interference arising from employers' intra-state activities, the question whether alleged unfair labor practices actually threaten interstate or foreign commerce in any substantial manner is presented and question would relate not to the existence of the federal power but to the propriety of its exercise on a given state of facts.—Pittsburgh Rys. Disestablishment of union

Where National Labor Relations Board had directed employer to disestablish a company union, such order deprived the state supreme court of jurisdiction of issues raised in action by company union against employer to recover union dues allegedly collected by employer under check-off system.—Lane Lifeboat & Davit Emp. Ass'n v. Lane Lifeboat & Davit Corp., supra.

to render effective any order issued with respect to the union defendants, the board does not have exclusive jurisdiction,[34] and a state court may have jurisdiction of the dispute.[35] Where suit is brought in a state court, in the belief that the employer is engaged exclusively in intra-state commerce, and representatives of the board voluntarily participate in the proceedings, the board cannot avoid the jurisdiction of the state court by instituting new proceedings beyond the reach of such court.[36]

Conflicting jurisdiction of boards. Where the dispute affects interstate commerce, the National Labor Relations Board has jurisdiction as against a state labor relations board,[37] and this is true under the express provisions of some of the state statutes.[38] Under a state labor relations act, containing practically the same provisions as the National Labor Relations Act, the state labor relations board has jurisdiction to administer the provisions of the state act,[39] until the National Labor Relations Board takes jurisdiction of the particular controversy, under the identical provisions of the federal statute;[40] but the fact that the federal board takes jurisdiction for one matter, such as with respect to the election or appointment of a bargaining agent, does not deprive the state board of jurisdiction of a different controversy.[41]

Loss of jurisdiction. Under a statute providing that a corporation whose charter has expired shall continue for a designated period of time for the purpose of prosecuting and defending suits, and settling up its affairs, if the board has acquired jurisdiction over a corporate employer, it does not lose that jurisdiction by reason of the fact that, before a decision and order, the corporate employer's charter has expired.[42] The board also does not lose jurisdiction by the fact that the person who filed the charge had ceased working for the employer and had ceased to be an officer in the union which was the authorized bargaining agent, before the filing of the charge.[43]

c. Under Railway Labor Act

The National Railway Adjustment Board has jurisdiction to adjust disputes with respect to the enforcement of contracts between a railroad company and its employees. The National Mediation Board has no power of enforcement of such contracts, but is limited to matters in dispute which are purely questions of mediation.

Under the Railway Labor Act of May 20, 1926 c 347 § 1 et seq, as amended by later acts, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, the National Railroad Adjustment Board has jurisdiction only of disputes, submitted to it for settlement, between a railroad on the one side and a union or its employees on the other side,[44] with respect to the enforcement of contracts between the railroad company and its employees,[45] which disputes, at least in part, have arisen after the effective date of the act.[46] This jurisdiction extends to disputes between a carrier and employees who are not members of a union.[47] If the dispute in question is not a "labor dispute," within the meaning of the statute, a court, rather than the administrative agencies, has jurisdiction.[48] The adjustment board has jurisdiction of jurisdictional disputes between a railroad and unions,[49] but not of such disputes between two groups of employees of the same employer,[50] or between rival unions of railroad employees.[51] The adjustment board's jurisdiction over disputes between employees and the carrier as to contract rights is not exclusive.[52]

Divisional jurisdiction. Under the Railway Labor Act § 3 subd 1 (h), 45 U.S.C.A. § 153 1 (h), the adjustment board is composed of four divisions, whose proceedings are independent of one another, and each division has jurisdiction over disputes involving particular classes of employees. The first division has jurisdiction over disputes involving train- and yard-service employees of carriers.[53] The fourth division has jurisdiction over disputes involving all other employees of carriers over which jurisdiction is not given to either of the other three divisions.[54]

System, group, or regional boards. Where, as provided by the Railway Labor Act § 153, Second, 45 U.S.C.A. § 153, Second, a system, group, or regional board of adjustment is established, by agreement between a carrier, system, or group of carriers and any class or classes of its or their employees, for the purpose of local settlement of disputes, such board, as long as it exists, has exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes, within the act, referred to it,[55] and, in such a case, the National Railroad Adjustment Board has

A controversy between labor union and railroad having inception because of divergent views relative to interpretation of employment contract as to machinist's seniority status was a "dispute between a carrier and a group of its employees" within Railway Labor Act giving jurisdiction of such disputes to National Railroad Adjustment Board and the fact that railroad, without an enforcement suit, was willing to comply with board's award sustaining union's position and complied with award after temporary injunction in favor of machinist was dissolved did not deprive board of jurisdiction.—Watson v. Computation of wages

A dispute between a brotherhood and railroad as to the question whether the cost of board furnished extra gang laborers in the maintenance of way department should be included in computation of wages paid for purpose of determining compliance with wage order pursuant to Fair Labor Standards Act promulgated after collective bargaining contract fixed a lower rate was properly submitted to National Railroad Adjustment Board.—Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees v. Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry., D.C.Tenn., 56 F.Supp. 559.

Railroad and shopmen's association

Where railroad and shopmen's association, which represented a majority of employees, agreed to establish system board of adjustment, the system board of adjustment had ex-

no jurisdiction;[56] nor has an aggrieved employee the right to elect to take his case either to the system board or the national board at his pleasure.[57] If, however, either party to such arrangement is dissatisfied therewith, it may, on ninety days' notice to the other party, elect to come under the jurisdiction of the National Adjustment Board.[58]

National Mediation Board. The National Mediation Board, as provided for by the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 154, 155, has no power of enforcement of contracts,[59] but is limited to questions which cannot be enforced by judicial proceedings,[60] and its jurisdiction may be invoked only where the matters in dispute are purely questions of mediation,[61] such as questions arising as to the formation of contracts.[62] It does not have jurisdiction to consider a controversy involving the rivalry between two groups of employees who are all members of the same union and a faction which is asserting that its constitutional rights have been violated within the union.[63]

§ 28(75). Conditions Precedent

a. In general
b. Charges

a. In General

As a general rule there must be a compliance with the requirements of the contract or statute involved before an administrative proceeding or an action at law may be instituted thereunder.

Any requirement of the contract between the union and the employer, or of the statute, under which the administrative proceeding or action at law is instituted, which is in the nature of a condition precedent, must be complied with before such a proceeding may be instituted before the labor relations board,[64] or before an action at law may be brought,[65] as the case may be, unless performance of the condition has been waived by defendant, or unless he is estopped to complain of its nonperformance.[66] A contract provision that a discharged employee may appeal to successive designated tribunals for a determination of his grievances, and have a reinstatement if the final decision of such tribunal sustains his contention, does not give him a right of action unless the tribunal finds that he was unjustly discharged,[67] and, although there is authority to the contrary,[68] the employee cannot properly complain to the courts for redress until he exhausts his remedy, before such tribunal, and shows an effective appeal entitling him to reinstatement and compensation for wages lost,[69] and, moreover, his failure to make such an appeal, at any stage of the proceedings, will constitute a waiver of his right to do so.[70] Under a contract requiring an employee first to seek adjustment of his grievance, not involving the construction of the terms of the agreement, with the foreman under whom he was employed, the employee may apply to the courts for the construction of certain words of the contract, without first applying to his foreman for such construction.[71] Where, however, the right asserted by an employee is in the nature of a property right, he is not required to exhaust the remedies provided for in the contract between the employer and the union, before seeking relief by way of damages in a court;[72] nor does an adverse decision against the employee in partially availing himself of those remedies preclude a resort to the courts for damages.[73] Where the constitution and by-laws of a union are not made a part of an employee's contract with his employer, the failure of the employee to pursue remedies afforded by the constitution and by-laws does not preclude him from resorting to the courts for a breach of the employment contract.[74] Where an employee must be a member of the union in order to retain his job, and where an employee is discharged on the ground that he is not a member of the union in good standing, the employee need not seek further relief in the union before resorting to the court where the seeking of further relief within the union would be futile.[75]

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 153 (i), 155 (l), relief must be sought through the highest operating officers of the railroad, as a condition precedent to proceeding before the adjustment board,[76] but not as a condition precedent to a suit in court.[77] Where, however, a dispute is carried through the various stages of the carrier's executive organization before it is filed with the mediation board, it is not necessary, after the dismissal of the case before such board, again to carry the proceedings through such stages, before filing it with the adjustment board.[78] An employee who contracts through an employees' association with a railroad company for the creation of a board to determine disputes pursuant to the Railway Labor Act must first present his grievances to such board before he may appeal to a law tribunal for redress of his wrongs,[79] unless such presentation, in accordance with the contract, is prevented by an act of the railroad company.[80] The failure of an employee to appeal, from an investigation by railroad officers, to higher officers of the railroad does not affect his right of action for a wrongful discharge, where there has not been a compliance with a rule requiring a verification of the record of such investigation by both parties.[81]

Appeal to higher officers of union. A union member is not required to exhaust his remedies within the union, as by appealing to higher officers, as a condition precedent to bringing an action against the union and his employer, for a breach of the contract between the union and the employer, where, under the circumstances, it would be unreasonable and a practical denial of justice to require him to do so.[82]

b. Charges

The filing of charges with the National Labor Relations Board is a condition precedent to the issuance of a complaint by such board.

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 10 b, 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (b), and the rules and regulations of the board with respect thereto, 29 U.S.C.A.Appendix, §§ 203.7–203.10, the filing of a charge of unfair labor practices, with the National Labor Relations Board, by an informer, authorized to do so,[83] is a condition precedent to the issuance of a complaint,[84] and is jurisdictional.[85]

Under the rules and regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, 29 U.S.C.A.Appendix, §§ 203.8–203.10 the charge must be in writing,[86] must be sworn to before a notary public, an agent of the board, or any other person duly authorized to administer oaths,[87] and must be filed with the regional director of the region in which the unfair labor practices have occurred or are occurring,[88] whereupon the regional director must serve on respondent a formal complaint stating the charges and containing a notice of hearing.[89] The charge filed with the board is not proof, and does not serve the purpose of a pleading, but merely sets in motion the machinery of an inquiry.[90] If the charge is withdrawn, the regional director must withdraw any complaint based thereon.[91]

§ 28(76). Time to Sue, Limitations, and Laches

In the absence of statute, the timeliness of an administrative proceeding before a labor relations board generally rests within the discretion of the board. Such a proceeding, however, as well as an action at law for the protection or enforcement of rights, may be barred by laches, if it is not prosecuted with due diligence.

Where the labor statute fixes no time limitation within which charges must be filed, it may not be contended that the labor relations board has not exercised due diligence in prosecuting the complaint.[92] The timeliness of a charge, under such a statute, is within the board's discretion,[93] and its failure to dismiss a complaint based on charges filed long after the occurrences complained of, without pointing out the unfair effect of the delay, does not constitute an abuse of discretion.[94] The rider attached to the National Labor Relations Board's appropriation act of 1944, prohibiting the use of the funds in connection with a "complaint case," arising over an agreement between management and labor, which has been in existence for at least three months without a complaint, has been held to put a limitation on proceedings, involving such matter, before the board.[95] A state statute of limitations does not restrict the power of a federal labor board to consider and adjust claims.[96]

Under the Railway Labor Act § 3, Second, 45 U.S.C.A. § 153, Second, a railroad and its employees, in agreeing to the establishment of a system board of adjustment, may fix a reasonable limitation on the time within which the board's jurisdiction may be invoked by appeal from a decision of the chief operating officer of a railroad.[97] Such limitation begins to run from the time the chief operating officer, designated to handle disputes, has rendered an adverse decision,[98] and, if the appeal is not taken within the time limited thereafter, the case is finally closed.[99]

Laches. If the complaint before the board involves the granting of affirmative relief, the case should be prosecuted to a conclusion with as much expedition as is reasonably practical,[1] and under some statutory provisions the controversy involved may become moot, if it is not adjusted within a designated period of time.[2] An employee's suit, such as for the restoration of seniority rights, may be barred by laches, if it is not prosecuted with due diligence.[3] An action by employees for an accounting and a determination of their status or relationship may also be barred by laches.[4]

Time to sue. Where a contract between a union and an employer is extended from time to time during negotiations for a new contract, but finally is erroneously rejected, without any justification, by the employer's representative, the union may sue immediately, as for an anticipatory breach,[5] or it may wait until an affirmative act, such as a refusal to perform a term of the contract, has occurred, and then sue for the breach.[6]

§ 28(77). Continuance

The continuance of a proceeding before a labor relations board generally rests within the discretion of the board or trial examiner.

In a proceeding before a labor relations board, such as the National Labor Relations Board, the matter of continuances rests within the discretion of the board or trial examiner,[7] and the exercise of that discretion should not be interfered with[8] unless it is clearly abused[9] or is prejudicial to the rights of the adverse party.[10]

§ 28(78). Stay

An action or proceeding may be stayed pending the determination of a jurisdictional dispute between rival unions; but ordinarily a stay will not be granted where the determination of an issue of fact is involved.

An action in court against or by an employer which involves a jurisdictional dispute between rival unions may be stayed pending a determination of such dispute by the proper board.[11] Where, however, the determination of an issue of fact is involved, a stay will not be granted,[12] such as a stay pending arbitration in accordance with the terms of an agreement between the parties, where such an issue is to be determined;[13] and under some statutes a stay pending arbitration will be refused where the application is not made until after the suit or proceeding is at issue.[14]

The respondent to an arbitration proceeding may be entitled to a stay thereof, where a question of law for determination by a court is presented;[15] and, where the arbitration is of disputes within the arbitration clause of an employment contract, a motion to stay the arbitration as to certain allegedly "non-arbitrable issues and matters" will be denied.[16] A stay of arbitration, however, under an arbitration clause of a collective bargaining agreement, may be denied to an employee who had knowledge of the agreement and that it was made for his benefit.[17] A stay may be denied subject to conditions imposed on respondent.[18] It has been held that the motion of an employer for a stay of arbitration proceedings be-

Member of union

One who was a member of union of laundry workers and in the employ of laundry operator at the time contract containing arbitration clause was made, and who knew of the contract and that it was made by the union in his behalf as one of the members thereof and that his wages, hours, and other interests were served by provisions of contract, became bound thereby and was not entitled to an order staying arbitration proceedings under the contract.—Sperling v. tween him and an alleged successor to a local union, with which the employer had entered into a contract containing arbitration provisions, should be granted where there is an issue of fact concerning the existence and identification of such successor.[19] Where there is no question as to the making of, or compliance with, an arbitration clause in a contract of employment, questions raised on a motion for a stay of the arbitration are determinable solely by the arbitrators, and an order of court staying arbitration is erroneous.[20]

§ 28(79). Abandonment, Dismissal, or Termination; Reinstatement

It is within the discretion of a labor relations board to determine whether a proceeding instituted before it may be abandoned, or whether a complaint dismissed without prejudice to the right to reinstate it may be reinstated.

It is within the discretion of a labor relations board, such as the National Labor Relations Board, to determine whether a proceeding instituted before it may be abandoned,[21] and it does not abuse its discretion in refusing to dismiss charges because an amicable settlement has been made, in the absence of any evidence as to the terms of the settlement,[22] or in refusing to dismiss a proceeding to determine whether the discharge of an employee was an unfair labor practice,[23] notwithstanding a letter written to the regional director by the complaining labor union withdrawing its charge and requesting a dismissal of the complaint.[24] An action in court against an employer should not be dismissed pending the determination of a jurisdictional dispute between rival unions by the proper board.[25]

Termination. After a complaint has been filed, and the object of the complaint has been accomplished, the proceedings should be brought to an end,[26] but as the board itself, representing the government, is a party in interest any agreement between the parties settling their differences must have its approval.[27]

Reinstatement. If a complaint before a labor relations board is dismissed without prejudice to the right to reinstate it, the board may subsequently reinstate the cause and determine the issues on the testimony theretofore heard,[28] notwithstanding a considerable time has elapsed.[29]

§ 28(80). Witnesses

In hearings before labor relations boards, the board or the examiner has discretion with respect to the examination of witnesses.

In proceedings before labor relations boards, the board or the examiner is vested with discretion in the examination of witnesses.[30] In hearings before the National Labor Relations Board the strict rules which govern the examination of witnesses in trials at law have been held not to be applicable.[31] The board has the right of examination and cross-examination of witnesses.[32] The examiner has discretion with respect to permitting leading questions to be asked of a witness.[33] The return and further

§ 28(81). —— Issuance of Subpœnas

Where authorized by statute, labor relations boards may issue subpœnas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence which relates to matter under investigation.

Where authority is conferred by statute, a subpœna may be issued by a labor relations board.[36] Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 161, for the purpose of all hearings and investigations the National Labor Relations Board, or any member thereof, has the power to issue subpœnas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence which relates to matter under investigation.[37] The subpœna must be obeyed if the evidence sought relates to matter under investigation by the board.[38] The board may not compel production of documentary or oral evidence which does not relate to or touch the matter under investigation or pry into the affairs of a business concern generally.[39] The board in conducting a preliminary investigation to determine whether the employer's business operations affect interstate commerce may issue a subpœna directing the employer to produce its records bearing on the question whether the employer is engaged in interstate commerce.[40] Requests for subpœnas should be viewed sympathetically in order to insure a fair hearing.[41]

An employer has the same right as the board to have the examiner issue subpœnas on its behalf.[42] The board may refuse the subpœna to an employer where his purpose is frivolous and dilatory[43] or where the witnesses sought to be summoned are to be used in an effort to build up a record of irrelevancy and immateriality.[44]

The subpœna may issue before any complaint is filed.[45] A rule of the board that applications for the issuance of subpœnas shall be timely and shall specify the name of the witness and the nature of the facts is designed to keep the inquiry within reasonable limits.[46] The rule is applicable to ordinary subpœnas as well as to subpœnas duces tecum.[47] The employer must comply with this rule,[48] but the employer is deprived of a fair hearing where the rule is applied to him but is not applied to counsel for the board.[49]

Enforcement. Under the National Labor Relations Act § 11, 29 U.S.C.A. § 161, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna, any United States district court, or the United States courts of any territory or possession, or the district court, formerly the supreme court, of the District of Columbia has jurisdiction to issue an order to compel the person to appear before the board to produce the evidence, and any failure of such person to obey the order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.[50] The proceeding in the district court to compel compliance with the subpœna of the board is not a suit of a civil nature governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure,[51] but is of a summary nature not requiring the issuance of process, hearing, findings of fact, and the elaborate process of a civil suit.[52] It does not constitute a review of the board's action or an independent action.[53]

As the statute directs, the procedure to enforce a subpœna issued by the National Labor Relations Board is by application to the United States district court for an order.[54] The board is entitled to have its order compelling obedience to a subpœna enforced without first alleging and showing that the employer is engaged in interstate commerce or that its activities affect commerce.[55] The enforcement by the district courts of a subpœna issued by the board is confided to the discretion of the court, which is to be judicially exercised.[56]

It has been held that the only questions presented are whether the subpœna was regularly issued and duly served and whether there has been a refusal to obey,[57] and that the district court has no jurisdiction to determine the relevancy and materiality of the evidential data sought to be produced,[58] although it has also been held that the district court may inquire only to ascertain that a proceeding is pending of which the board has jurisdiction and that the evidence sought relates to or touches the matter under investigation,[59] and that the application of the board should be dismissed on the merits if it is found that the evidence sought does not relate to matter under investigation.[60] The question whether or not the findings of the board with respect to unfair labor practices are sustained by the evidence may not be litigated.[61]

Where the production of books and records before the examiner would interfere with the employer's business, the order requiring compliance with the subpœna may provide a convenient method of compliance which will not interfere with the employer's business.[62]

Effect of prior application

Application by board for order enforcing subpœna for employer's pay roll was not subject to objection based on similar prior application to court of another district, wherein employer filed bill to restrain board, it appearing that prior application was withdrawn before making of subsequent application, and that after hearing on subsequent application foreign court quashed subpœnas issued on bill filed therein because of absence of proper service.—N. L. R. B. v. New England Transp. Co., supra.

Employer's conclusion of irrelevancy

Where an application was filed for an order requiring an employer to obey a subpœna to produce a card index, if employer's conclusion that card index was not relevant was not final, at least some evidence was required to show that it was wrong, and, in absence thereof, district court erred in ordering compliance with subpœna.—Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. Order held proper

District court's order compelling obedience to subpoenas issued by board, in connection with petition filed with board for investigation and certification of representatives for bank's employees pursuant to National Labor Relations Act, properly placed limitations on subpoenas by providing that bank should be required to produce at a single time only such documents as would not unduly interfere with its banking business, and could, on adjournment of any session of such hearing, return such documents to its place of business.—N. L. R. B. v. Northern Trust Co., C.C.A.Ill., 148 F.2d 24, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 38, 326 U. S. 731, 90 L.Ed. 435 and American Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago

Board of mediation. A statute authorizing a state board of mediation to subpœna and compel the attendance of witnesses gives the board power to compel attendance, not of parties to labor disputes, but only of necessary witnesses at hearings conducted after a voluntary submission of such disputes for mediation.[63]

§ 28(83). —— Who May Institute Proceedings or Action

a. In general
b. Who may sue at law

a. In General

Provision usually is made in the statutes as to the persons or entities who may institute administrative proceedings for the settlement of labor disputes.

The National Labor Relations Act § 10 b, 49 U.S.C.A. § 160 b, does not limit the class of persons who may lodge complaints with the National Labor Relations Board.[64] At least prior to the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, 49 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, it was held that the only persons authorized to file charges under the National Labor Relations Act were the employees whose work had ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice of the employer,[65] or their agency or employee representative, who dealt with the employer concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.[66]

A labor organization filing a charge must have some direct connection with, or relationship to, the employees and be capable of acting as a bargaining representative,[67] and must be an existing organization eligible to bring the charges.[68] The dubious character, evil or unlawful motives, misconduct, or bad faith of the informer does not disqualify him or it from filing charges or deprive the board of its jurisdiction to conduct an inquiry,[69] although such misconduct of a labor union, which has filed charges, may be considered by the board as material to its own decision to entertain and proceed on the charge.[70] The fact that a union has been inactive, due largely to the employer's undermining efforts, is not such a change of status as will prevent it from filing charges against the employer.[71]

Under some state statutes it is the mandatory duty of the labor relations board to institute an investigation at the request of a labor union, a fair employer, or a designated per cent of the employees.[72] A labor relations board, however, cannot be said to be a "party" to the litigation in the sense that that term is customarily used,[73] as it should be impartial and should not be able to convert itself into a litigant and become the partisan advocate of one or the other of the parties whose cause it has heard.[74] Under some statutes it has been held that an employer may not be required to defend the complaints of rival unions,[75] particularly with respect to controversies which have been adjusted between the parties,[76] unless the bargaining union has sacrificed its right to be such[77] or the employer has exercised some influence or control over such union.[78]

Under the Railway Labor Act an aggrieved employee not only has the right to be heard by the union and the carrier, but he also has the right to participate in the procedure before the board,[79] and may conduct proceedings before the adjustment board, if necessary, either personally[80] or through a chosen representative,[81] which may or may not be a labor organization.[82] The exclusive authority vested by the act in a duly selected collective agent to negotiate and conclude agreements concerning major disputes includes the representation of employees in mediation, arbitration, and conciliation proceedings;[83] but this power does not extend to the settlement of grievances to the exclusion of the right of aggrieved employees of any effective voice in the settlement and of an individual hearing before the board.[84] The extent of the authority of the collective agent to represent an employee before the adjustment board is not controlled by any technical agency rules, but may be affected by the custom and practice in the railroad world.[85]

b. Who May Sue at Law

An employee who is affected by a breach of the contract between the employer and the labor union may generally bring an action therefor as a third-party beneficiary.

According to some decisions an individual member of a labor union may not, in the absence of ratification or assent, maintain an action for the breach of an agreement between the employer and the union, of which such employee is a member, with respect to wages and conditions of service.[86] According to other decisions, however, such agreement is regarded as being primarily for the benefit of the individual members of the union, and the rights secured as being the rights of such members, and therefore an action for its breach may be brought directly by an individual member,[87] even though not mentioned by name in such contract.[88] If the contract purports to be made for the benefit of all employees, both members and nonmembers of the union, an action for its breach may be maintained by one who is not a member of the union;[89] but it has been held that the fact that a contract violates the constitution and by-laws of a union cannot be raised by one outside the union.[90] If the contract expressly names employees as third-party beneficiaries, and provides that only union members in good standing will be employed, employees and union members will be regarded as one and the same, so that members of the union may bring a representative suit on the contract, as direct and third-party beneficiaries,[91] notwithstanding a provision in the agreement authorizing the employer to employ nonunion men when qualified union members are not available.[92]

It has been held that a suit by a single employee to enforce his individual rights, or to recover damages for being discharged, is not directly on the collective agreement as a complete contract made for his benefit, since it is merely the basis for his contract of employment,[93] but is a suit on his contract of hiring which, by reference or otherwise, has adopted the terms of the collective agreement which are applicable to him.[94] This rule has been applied to a railroad employee's suit for damages for a breach of contract and for a decree directing his reinstatement with full seniority rights.[95]

Coercion. If a statute which makes it a criminal offense for an employer to require an employee or person seeking employment to agree not to become or remain a member of any labor organization, or to threaten him with loss of employment or unjustly discriminate against him because of his membership in such an organization, may be assumed to give a right to a civil remedy, such remedy is confined to employees or to persons seeking employment.[96]

§ 28(84). —— Against Whom Proceedings or Action May Be Prosecuted

It has been held that an employer cannot maintain an action at law for damages against a labor union which is a voluntary unincorporated association not possessing the power to sue or be sued.

It has been held that an employer cannot maintain an action at law for damages against a labor union which is a voluntary unincorporated association, at least where such an association does not have the power to sue or be sued,[97] unless such an action is authorized by statute.[98] Where a complaint for unfair labor practice has issued against a predecessor, the proceedings may be continued against the successor who is in privity with the predecessor.[99] A proceeding, however, against a wholly owned subsidiary of a parent corporation does not give the board jurisdiction to enter an order against the parent corporation[1] unless it is shown that the control of the subsidiary by the parent corporation wrongs or defrauds someone with whom the proceedings are concerned.[2]

§ 28(85). —— Necessary and Proper Parties

The usual rules with respect to necessary and proper parties generally apply in an administrative proceeding before a labor relations or arbitration board.

Statute not authorizing action

A statute empowering an unincorporated association issuing certificates of association to sue and be sued, and limiting the power given to actions on certificates of insurance, does not authorize a contractor to maintain an action at law for damages against a trade union which was a voluntary unincorporated association of individuals.—Hallman v. the award of a board of arbitrators functioning under a contract between a union and an employers' association.[4] An association made up of individual truck owners is a proper party to a proceeding to compel arbitration under a written employment contract entered into by the truck drivers' union with individual truck owners.[5]

In proceeding before National Labor Relations Board. In a proceeding against an employer for unfair labor practices in violation of the National Labor Relations Act, neither the labor union[6] nor the employees[7] involved are indispensable or necessary parties in order to enable the board to determine whether the employer has violated the statute, and a failure to make them parties is not an abuse of the board's discretion.[8] The fact that one is a witness before the board does not make him, or an employer or union of which he is an officer, a party to the proceeding.[9]

A company-formed or company-dominated union is not a necessary party to a proceeding against the employer for unfair labor practices,[10] such as a proceeding to determine that the employer is guilty of dominating and supporting the union,[11] or to a proceeding to displace such union as the representative of the employees, and order the employer to cease recognizing it, since such an order would not run against the union,[12] although as to the latter proposition there is also authority to the contrary.[13]

A labor union, however, or the employees, are necessary or proper parties to a proceeding which puts in issue the validity of a contract between the union and the employer,[14] and the fact that the contract, a closed-shop contract, is illegal does not authorize the board to declare it illegal without the employees or their union being made parties;[15] and, moreover, in such a proceeding the employer may not be regarded as being sued in a representative capacity for the employees.[16] The union has a right to be made a

"The National Labor Relations Act contemplates no more than the protection of the public rights which it creates and defines, and as the board's order is directed solely to the employer and is ineffective to determine any private rights of the employees and leaves them free to assert such legal rights as they may have acquired under their contracts, in any appropriate tribunal, we think they are not indispensable parties."—National Licorice Co. v. party to such a proceeding, irrespective of the board's orders or rules,[17] and the fact that the board has failed to plead a closed-shop contract does not excuse its failure to make the contracting union a party to the proceeding.[18]

If the right asserted by the board arises solely out of a bargaining contract, the performance of which does not inherently result in a violation of the act, the beneficiaries of the contract or their representatives are necessary parties,[19] but if the contract is inherently unfair, or its performance will result in the continuance of unfair labor practices, the beneficiaries or their representatives are not necessary parties,[20] but may be made parties in the discretion of the board.[21]

An "employees council or committee" which is allegedly dominated by the employer is not a necessary party to a proceeding against the employer to withdraw recognition of such council or committee as the representative of the employees[22] or to disestablish such committee and to declare void a contract between it and the employer.[23]

In a proceeding before the National Railroad Adjustment Board an employee whose seniority rights would be vitally affected thereby is a necessary party.[24]

In a proceeding before the National Mediation Board an employer-dominated labor organization has no legal standing in a controversy with respect to the bargaining representative of the clerical employees of a railroad.[25]

§ 28(86). —— Intervention

The usual rules as to intervention generally apply in a proceeding before a labor relations board or in a judicial proceeding with respect to a labor dispute.

The usual rules as to intervention generally apply in a proceeding before a labor relations board[26] or in a judicial proceeding with respect to a labor dispute,[27] except in so far as controlled by the labor relations acts and rules and regulations adopted thereunder.[28]

Intervention in a proceeding before the National Labor Relations Board by persons who are not necessary parties to the proceeding is within the discretion of the board[29] or of the member or agency conducting the hearing.[30] If an issue is properly joined between the board and the employer, intervention by a committee of employees or by individual employees may properly be refused.[31] In proceedings against the employer, permission to intervene may be denied to an employer-dominated employees group or union,[32] particularly where the records and operations of such group are examined during the hearing and the leading representatives of the association testify at length.[33] It may also be denied to employees opposed to the union in an unfair labor practice proceeding[34] or to persons to whom the matter in controversy is of no concern;[35] and, moreover, a union or its locals, having notice of the proceeding, are under no duty to intervene if they are not put on notice that their interests are involved.[36] The board may refuse to permit one union to intervene in a case before it filed by a rival union.[37] Private parties have no rightful place, as by intervention, in proceedings before the board except as the board may desire to avail itself of helpful suggestions.[38]

Under Railway Labor Act § 3 (j), 45 U.S.C.A. § 153 (j), an employee involved in a controversy with his employer may intervene in a proceeding before the National Railroad Adjustment Board which might adversely affect him.[39]

§ 28(87). Notice and Appearance

The usual rules as to notice to necessary and proper parties apply in a proceeding before a labor relations board, in an arbitration proceeding, or in an action at law.

In a proceeding before a labor relations board all necessary and proper parties should be given notice and an opportunity to be heard on all points properly in issue.[40] Such notice, however, is not necessary to one whose presence is not necessary to the determination of the particular issue before the board.[41] It has been held that notice to a company-formed union is not necessary, in a proceeding against the employer for unfair labor practices, with respect to the organization and recognition of such union, since the presence of the union is not necessary to enable the board to determine whether the employer has violated the statute or to make an appropriate order against the employer, such as to withdraw its recognition of the union.[42] On the other hand, it has been held that notice to such union is necessary where the proceeding involves the setting aside of a contract between the union and the employer[43] or where the proceeding involves the destruction of the existence of the union,[44] and this rule has been held to apply even though the employees who organized the union have a right to intervene.[45]

Right of intervention no substitute
The right of employees who had organized a so-called "inside union" to intervene was not a substitute for service of complaint, notice

A labor union does not have sufficient notice to require an appearance from the mere fact that its president is produced as a witness for the employer,[46] and the publicity of the proceedings does not charge the union or its members with notice thereof.[47] If an employee's association is served with a copy of the complaint and notice of the hearing it is subject to the board's jurisdiction although it does not appear;[48] and, on the other hand, if a party voluntarily appears and participates in the proceedings he is also subject to the court's jurisdiction even though he has not been served with notice.[49]

Under Railway Labor Act. In a proceeding before the National Railroad Adjustment Board for the adjustment of a dispute relating to the enforcement of a contract, every person involved in the controversy who may be adversely affected by an order entered in the proceeding should be given reasonable notice of the hearing[50] even though he is not named as a party,[51] and a failure to give such notice is not excused by the difficulty or inconvenience of giving it.[52] The board, however, is not deprived of jurisdiction to proceed with respect to a person not served with process, if such person has actual knowledge of the proceeding and hearing,[53] or of such facts as would put him on notice,[54] in view of the power of the board to correct an error and of the right of such person to intervene in, or otherwise be made a party to, a suit in court to enforce the order of the board.[55] Notice may be waived by intervening in the proceeding.[56]

The notice may be informal,[57] and may be delivered by mail,[58] or it may be given by posting it in appropriate places.[59] Notice to every individual member of an organized group of employees is unnecessary; it is generally sufficient to bind the members that notice is given to duly constituted officers of the organization.[60]

In a proceeding before a system, group, or regional board of adjustment, established by agreement, which provides that due and timely notice shall be given to an employee involved in a dispute before such board, a member of a union involved in such dispute is entitled to such notice[61] although he is not and hearing.—N. L. R. B. v. Sterling Electric Motors, C.C.A.9, 109 F.2d 194, reheard 112 F.2d 63, set aside on other grounds 114 F.2d 738, motion denied Ex parte N. L. R. Contents of complaint

Neither union nor members were chargeable with notice of the contents of complaint because of publicity given the proceeding, and were not required to inform themselves that something might be done affecting them because the complaint alleged that the officers of employer had sought to persuade employees to join a labor organization not of their own choosing.—N. Union Terminal Co., supra.

Suit to enjoin enforcement

Application to adjustment board concerning matters complained of was not a prerequisite to maintenance of class action to enjoin enforcement of awards of the board which plaintiff contended board had no jurisdiction to make for lack of personal jurisdiction and which were destructive of rights personal to plaintiff and member of class he represented in violation of constitutional privileges.—Templeton v. named as a party to the dispute.[62] Notice to the union is not notice to an employee whose claim is contested by the union.[63] In case of a dispute involving seniority rights between one employee and another employee, the employee who does not receive or waive notice of the hearing is not bound by the board's decision in favor of the other employee.[64]

Arbitration. Notice to the representatives of employers of what a board set up for the arbitration of a labor dispute proposes to do constitutes notice to the employers.[65]

In action. In a contractor's action at law for damages against a labor union which is a voluntary unincorporated association, it has been held that process cannot be served on the association since there is no legal entity capable of being served with process.[66]

§ 28(89). —— Complaint or Petition

a. In administrative proceedings
b. In judicial proceedings

a. In Administrative Proceedings

(a) Issuance of complaint
(b) Requisites and sufficiency

(a) Issuance of Complaint

As a general rule under the statutes the issuance of a complaint rests within the discretion of the labor relations board, after an investigation of the charges which have been filed.

As a general rule under the labor relations acts the case between the labor relations board and respondent begins with the complaint prepared and issued by the board;[67] and since, as stated supra § 28 (75), the filing of charges is a condition precedent to the issuance of a complaint the board may not initiate a complaint on its own motion[68] but must await the filing of charges.[69] The board should investigate the charges before issuing the complaint,[70] and, after such investigation, it has a wide discretion as to whether it will issue a complaint[71] and as to the time of its issuance,[72] and accordingly it may issue a complaint for violations occurring after a decree of enforcement.[73] A charge of interference, restraint, and coercion of employees in the exercise of their right of self-organization and discriminatory discharge of named employees because of their union activities has been held sufficient to authorize the issuance of a complaint[74] even though the union which makes the charge does not represent a majority of the employees.[75]

This discretion of the board involves expert administrative policy, and is not a legal discretion, at established by agreement between union and company, to settle dispute involving seniority rights as between such member and another employee, whose cause was espoused by union. —Primakow v. Railway Express Agency, supra.

least not to the extent of authorizing the courts to compel it to issue a complaint.[76] The board is not required to move on every charge which may be filed, but is merely enabled to do so.[77] It may decline to be imposed on, or to submit its process to abuse,[78] and may properly withhold or dismiss its own complaint if such abuse becomes apparent.[79] The board's power to issue a complaint cannot be affected by an agreement between the employer and the labor union.[80]

Effect of receivership. The fact that a receiver has been appointed for the respondent employer does not require that prior leave be obtained for the state court which appointed the receiver before the board may file a complaint.[81]

(b) Requisites and Sufficiency

A complaint should be sufficient to advise the respondent of the nature of the charges against him, should contain a plain statements of the facts, and should be issued in the manner required by the statute or by the rules and regulations of the board. A complaint may be amended.

The sole function of a complaint under a labor relations act, such as the National Labor Relations Act, is to apprise respondent of the charges against him so that he may have due notice and a full opportunity for a hearing.[82] The complaint, therefore, as issued, must accord with the charges[83] and must be adequate to advise respondent of the unfair labor practices therein charged,[84] although the particularity of a pleading at law or in equity is not required.[85] The complaint need not contain the names of individuals or the time and place of occurrences;[86] but there should be a plain statement of the facts which are claimed to constitute unfair labor practices,[87] although it is not necessary to set out the particular facts which constitute such practice, as finally found, if the parties to the proceeding know the basis of the complaint,[88] and since, as stated supra § 28 (68), the board may suspend its rules the fact that the complaint violates the rules of the board has been held immaterial.[89] The sufficiency of the complaint is to be considered in the light of the fact that the proceeding is not punitive but preventive and in the interest of the general public.[90] Under some state labor relations acts the complaint should allege facts which show the board's jurisdiction of the subject matter.[91]

As not precluding issuance of complaint

An agreement between the employer and a labor union that all cases pending before the board should be withdrawn and that no further claims of discrimination would be presented to the board or to the employer for alleged discriminations against the union or its members occurring prior to the date of the agreement does not preclude the board from issuing a complaint against the employer for unfair labor practices based on charges filed with respect to the employer's conduct prior to the agreement.—N. Under the rules and regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, 29 U.S.C.A.Appendix § 203.11, a complaint may be issued and filed in a regional office, by the regional director, in the name of the board,[92] and may be signed by the director.[93]

Joinder. The board, in its discretion, may combine several matters relating to the same employer, or respondent, in one complaint.[94] It may combine a complaint proceeding against the employer with an employee-representation proceeding,[95] and the fact that the board, without hearing from respondent, consolidates charges made by separate unions against the same employer does not invalidate the proceedings[96] if the findings and conclusions are separately made and disconnected occurrences do not appear to have been illogically confused.[97]

Amendment. Subject to the limitation that respondent may not be taken by surprise, or that no disadvantage or injury accrue to him, the complaint may be amended with respect to the charges against respondent.[98] The board or trial examiner may, in his discretion, permit the complaint to be amended by adding names, referable to the same basic charge,[99] or by supplying omitted allegations,[1] such as to conform the pleadings to the proof;[2] and the fact that the examiner so exercises his discretion affords no ground for challenging the validity of the proceedings.[3] If respondent is afforded ample opportunity to meet the issue, and none of his substantial rights is invaded, a formal amendment is not required,[4] and in such a case respondent may not complain of an allegation by amendment made a few months before the hearing.[5]

§ 28(90). —— Answer

Allegations as to irrelevant and immaterial matters in an employer's answer may properly be stricken.

Allegations as to irrelevant and immaterial matters in an employer's answer in an administrative proceeding before a labor relations board may properly be stricken.[11] Where an employer, charged with unfair labor practices, alleges in his answer that the labor organization was engaged in a conspiracy to seize plants under the guise of collective bargaining activity, it has been held that such allegations may be properly stricken for the purpose of preventing the introduction of testimony to sustain them,[12] but they cannot be stricken from the record as admissions of the employer's fixed purpose not to recognize a particular union.[13]

§ 28(91). —— Issues, Proof, and Variance

As a general rule in a proceeding before a labor board the issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings, although it has been held that, if the respondent is given full opportunity to meet the testimony, or to produce further proof, he may not complain of a variance between the pleadings and proof.

Although no particular form of procedure is essential in presenting the issues to respondent charged with unfair labor practices,[14] as a general rule the issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings,[15] and the issues as thus raised must be proved.[16] On the other hand, the trial and determination of an issue not clearly raised by the pleadings has been held not to be error where the parties are afforded ample time to meet the issue,[17] and it has also been held that, if respondent is given full opportunity to meet the testimony, he may not complain of a variance between the pleadings and the proof,[18] such as to the

Fair hearing
Employer could not complain that he was not afforded a fair and un-

dates on which employees were discharged;[19] and, moreover, if he is not misled and does not raise the question until the conclusion of the hearing, he may not raise a jurisdictional issue that words were omitted from the complaining union's name as signed to the charge.[20]

Where the complaint alleges that the employer had wrongfully discharged employees on or about specified dates, the date of discharge is open to proof within the usual, reasonable limits.[21] Allegations in the complaint that the employer discharged employees for union activity on or about certain dates does not bind the board to limit its proof to discharges on those particular dates merely because the employer in his answer admitted that at the time mentioned he had discharged employees for cause.[22]

§ 28(92). Evidence in General

Where the statutes so provide, the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity are not controlling in proceedings by labor relations boards to prevent unfair labor practices.

Although the contrary is true under some statutes,[23] under a number of labor relations statutes in proceedings by the boards to prevent unfair labor practices the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity are not controlling.[24] The board is not required before making its findings to sift out the various items of evidence before it and reserve for special treatment those items which would have been inadmissible in a court of law under the technical rules of evidence.[25] However, the statutes do not abolish the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law and equity.[26]

Where a board of conciliation and arbitration in the performance of its duties acts as a quasi-judicial tribunal, nothing can be treated by the board as evidence which is not introduced as such.[27]

§ 28(93). Presumptions and Burden of Proof

In proceedings to prevent unfair labor practices by an employer, the presumption obtains that the employer has not violated the law, and the burden is on the one alleging the commission of unfair labor practices to prove them.

In proceedings to prevent unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar state statutes, various presumptions have been indulged.[28] The presumption obtains that the employer has not violated the statprejudiced hearing because of a variance between evidence taken before trial examiner and allegations of complaint charging unfair labor practices, even if any variance existed, where examiner allowed employer full opportunity to meet testimony and at conclusion of hearing asked employer whether he desired any more time to develop case as to any phase of complaint as amended.—N. L. R. B. v. Grieder Machine Tool & Die Co., supra.

The board should not be held to the precise dates alleged in the complaint or found by the examiner; proof of an act or offense in violation of the statute within the limitation period is sufficient.—M. H. Ritzwoller Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 7, 114 F.2d 432.

28. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Piqua Munising Wood Products Co., C.C.A.6, 109 F.2d 552.

Where employer during strike abandoned one plant and opened new plant in another city, fact that reasons for not taking some of its workmen to that city lies exclusively within its own knowledge raises ute;[29] and the act does not establish a presumption that employees are always to be deemed to be aiding a violation of the act if they prefer no organization and decline to create one.[30] Preference by employees for, and their selection of, an unaffiliated as against a nationally affiliated organization raises no presumption that this preference was coerced or purchased by the employer.[31]

Where there is a legitimate cause for an employee's discharge there can be no presumption that the discharge was illegal.[32] The unexplained hiring of inexperienced nonunion employees in preference to union employees active in union affairs is sufficient to create a reasonable inference of discrimination.[33]

Where a majority of employees has selected a bargaining agent, until such employees take action to express a new choice it will be presumed that the authority of the bargaining agent continues[34] for a reasonable time;[35] but, where employees have put an express time limit on the authority of their bargaining agent, the agent's authority cannot be presumed to continue beyond the time limited.[36] Where an employer has improperly refused to bargain with the authorized labor organization, it may reasonably be assumed that any diminution in the membership of the labor organization was due to the employer.[37] A mere witness is not presumed to know the contents of the pleadings or prayers of the litigants.[38]

Under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, in the absence of any special agreement otherwise, every railway employment may be presumed to be on the basis of the collective agreement and to adopt its terms.[39]

Burden of proof. In proceedings to prevent unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq; and similar state statutes, the burden of proof is on the one alleging violation of the statute to prove that unfair labor practices have been committed.[40] Thus it is presumption against employer on question whether it would have offered jobs in new plant if there had been no strike, although the burden remains on board in proceeding to compel reinstatement.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. incumbent on the one so alleging to prove interference, restraint, or coercion by an employer of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the statutes[41] or domination or interference by an employer with the formation or administration of any labor organization.[42] Where the employer formerly dominated a union he has the burden of establishing that the consequences of his domination have been fully dissipated.[43]

The burden of proof is not on the employer, but rather on the person who asserts the fact, to prove that an employee was discharged in violation of the statutes because of participation in union activities.[44] Where the employer shows that he was justified in discharging an employee, the burden is on the employee to show that the dismissal was for union activity;[45] where the employer's explanation of the motivating cause of the discharge of an employee is reasonable, the burden is on the board to establish the falsity of the explanation and that the motivating reason was union affiliation.[46] Where there is substantial evidence to indicate that an employee was discharged because of his union activities, a very definite burden is imposed on the employer to prove the existence of a reason, not within the prohibitions of the act, sufficient in itself to justify the discharge.[47] An inference of discriminatory discharge, unless destroyed and refuted, leaves it up to the employer to give an adequate explanation.[48] Where the employer claims that the discharge was justified because of a closed-shop agreement, the employer has the burden of proving the closed-shop agreement.[49]

Attitude of employer after passage of statute

Decision of board as ground for ordering reinstatement of discharged employees, that no affirmative reason was found for believing that employer's attitude toward unionization had changed after effective date of labor relations act, improperly placed on employer burden of producing affirmative proof that its attitude had changed.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Frank G. Shattuck Co., 20 N.Y.S.2d 949, 260 App.Div. 315.

Under National Labor Relations Act

Prior to amendment of 1947 to National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(3), the rule of the text applied, and the employer was required to show either that a designation or selection of the labor organization claimed to have executof a strike, the burden rests on the employer, so refusing to bargain, to show that the strike would have taken place even though he had not refused to bargain.[50]

In an action by several employees against the employer on a written agreement between such employees and employer, the burden is on the employer to prove a contention that a delegate authorized to represent the employees had authority to alter the written contract by an oral agreement.[51]

§ 28(94). Admissibility of Evidence

Where the statutes so provide, labor relations boards in proceedings to prevent unfair labor practices are not bound by technical rules concerning the admissibility of evidence.

Where the statutes so provide, in proceedings to prevent unfair labor practices the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity are not controlling, and the boards are not bound by technical rules concerning the admissibility of evidence.[52] All facts tending to prove or disprove a violation of the statute are competent evidence.[53] The mere admission of matter which would be deemed incompetent in judicial proceedings does not invalidate the orders of the board;[54] and under such statutes the boards may hear incompetent evidence,[55] including hearsay evidence.[56]

In proceedings by labor boards to prevent unfair labor practices the evidence has been held admissible or inadmissible in various cases[57] with respect to ed the agreement as an agent to bargain generally for working conditions or specifically for a closed shop had been made by a majority of employees in an appropriate unit of employees of the bargaining employer, or that the employees were members of the labor organization claimed to have executed the agreement and that the organization was so constituted as to be empowered to act as such an agent, and that it had in its membership a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit of employees of the bargaining employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Mason Mfg. Co., C.C.A.9, 126 F.2d 810.

Materiality of evidence

It has been held, however, that such a statute is not intended to limit the well-known rules relating to the materiality of evidence.—N. L. R. B. v. Illinois Tool Works, C.C.A.7, 119 F.2d 356.

Nonlegal evidence must have substantial probative force and may not be mere opinion, except in fields where opinion of experts is proper for consideration and person giving it is shown to have some special knowledge reasonably entitling his opinion to some weight.—Folding Furniture Works v. If hearsay evidence is corroborative of other evidence or is otherwise of such nature as to have some reasonable bearing on fact for determination, it may be admitted.—Folding Furniture Works v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, 285 N.W. 851, 232 Wis. 170, rehearing denied 286 N.W. 875, 232 Wis. 170.

Rejection of hearsay rests in board's discretion

such issues as whether a union was a labor organization within the statute,[58] interference with or restraint or coercion by employers of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the act,[59] domination or interference by the employer with the formation or administration of any labor organization,[60] discrimination by the employer with regard to hire and tenure of employment because of union activities,[61] including the discharge of employees,[62] and the refusal of employers to bargain collectively

(3) Inquiry into employer's affairs which was immaterial and which might be used to employer's detriment.—N. L. R. B. v. Washington Dehydrated Food Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F. 2d 980.

(4) Testimony of employees that they voluntarily revoked authorizations of union, where unfair labor practices occurred before, and still existed when, the revocations were executed.—N. L. R. B. v. New Era Die Co., C.C.A.3, 118 F.2d 500.

Receipt of documents without authentication

Statutory provision that rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling permits receipt of letters and documents without authentication.—Folding Furniture Works v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, 285 N.W. 851, 232 Wis. 170, rehearing denied 286 N.W. 875, 232 Wis. 170.

Testimony with respect to what employer did and what he said was admissible, but admission of testimony with respect to employer's intent in so doing or saying was improper.—Folding Furniture Works v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, supra.

Copies of documents subpœnaed

Where witness producing copies of documents pursuant to subpœna for production of certain documents of labor union in hearing before board stated he did not know where originals were, the absence of originals was sufficiently accounted for to warrant admission of copies.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

58. Alleged criminal activity of labor union which filed charges against employer was material on question whether union was a labor organization.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., C.C.A.6, 124 F.2d 50, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 394, 318 U.S. 9, 87 L.Ed. 579.

Statement of company's policy on bulletin board

In proceeding on charges of unfair labor practices, statement of policy which appeared on employer's bulletin board on date when union which filed charges had majority in appropriate unit was relevant and material and admissible as bearing on employer's attitude, even though it may have been an exercise of employer's constitutional right of free speech.—N. L. R. B. v. Chicago Apparatus Co., C.C.A.7, 116 F.2d 753.

Circular distributed by employer to employees, and which set out rights of employees to organize independent union, affiliate with national organization, or be free from joining any union, was admissible on question of domination by employer of inside labor organization.—N. L. R. B. v. Blossom Products Corporation, C.C.A.3, 121 F.2d 260.

Alleged statement by organizers expressing hostility to certain national labor union was immaterial.—A. E. Staley Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 117 F.2d 868.

Limitation as to time of occurrence of acts

Board was not guilty of discriminatory treatment because evidence of company coercion in 1935 was admitted as bearing on independence of new company union in 1937, whereas, on issue of influence of outside union's violence in formation of 1937 company union, board drew line at events six months prior thereto.—N. L. R. B. v. Donnelly Garment Co., 67 S.Ct. 756, 330 U.S. 219, 91 L.Ed. —.

61. Employer's personnel records were relevant evidence.—Montgomery Ward & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 7, 107 F.2d 555.

62. Evidence held admissible

U.S.—Tyne Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C. A.7, 125 F.2d 832—N. L. R. B. v. Vincennes Steel Corporation, C.C.A. 7, 117 F.2d 169.

Statements and actions of foremen, inspectors, etc.

(1) Evidence of supervisory employee's statement that if discharged employee "had stayed out of the union he would have been working today" was admissible.—N. L. R. B. v. Entwistle Mfg. Co., C.C.A.4, 120 F.2d 532.

(2) Testimony as to opinion of employer's foreman regarding reason for discharge of certain employees was not relevant where foreman had nothing to do with discharge.—N. L. R. B. v. Tex-O-Kan Flour Mills Co., C.C.A.5, 122 F.2d 433.

(3) Board properly considered testimony concerning statements and actions of inspectors, foremen, and subforemen, including attempts to induce employees to join company union and threats that they would be discharged if they did not cease their activity in the other union.—N. L. R. B. v. Walworth Co., C.C.A.7, 124 F.2d 816.

(4) Testimony with respect to what employer's sons had said as to employer's ability to increase wages was improperly admitted in absence of showing that sons knew anything about the matter.—Folding Furniture Works v. Wisconsin Labor Relations Board, 285 N.W. 851, 232 Wis. 170, rehearing denied 286 N.W. 875, 232 Wis. 170.

with their employees' representatives.[63] The attitude of the employer toward unions and the history of labor relations at the employer's plant are relevant circumstances to be considered by the board in ascertaining the existence of unfair labor practices.[64] Testimony relating to the arrest of a witness is inadmissible for impeachment purposes in the absence of a showing of a conviction on the charges.[65]

Actions for breach of union contract. In actions by an employee against the employer for breach of a union contract the general rules governing the admissibility of evidence in civil actions ordinarily are applicable.[66]

§ 28(95). Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence

The statutory relaxation of the strict rules of evidence in proceedings before labor relations boards does not justify orders by the boards without a basis in evidence having rational probative force.

Statutes providing that the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling do not justify orders by labor relations boards without a basis in evidence having rational probative force,[67] and, as considered infra § 28 (136), the findings of the boards as to the facts are not binding on the courts on review unless they are supported by substantial or credible evidence. The relaxation of the strict rules pertaining to the admission of evidence does not limit the well-known rules relating to the weight of evidence;[68] it does not permit the boards arbitrarily to substitute surmise, suspicion, rumor, gossip, or guess for proof.[69] The statutory power given to the board to decide the facts does not authorize it to ignore conceded, undisputed, or established material facts.[70]

Circumstantial, as well as direct, evidence may be relied on.[71] The board may draw inferences from

Evidence of employees' election to determine collective bargaining agency and agreement between employer and union for such election under National Labor Relations Act is competent at hearing on charge in complaint pending before national labor relations board that employer refused to bargain with union as such agency.—Surpass Leather Co. v. Winters, D.C.N.Y., 23 F.Supp. 776.

Testimony of chief economist for board, as an expert on subject of process of collective bargaining, was not objectionable.—N. L. R. B. v. Griswold Mfg. Co., C.C.A.3, 106 F.2d 713.

(1) History of labor relations at employer's plant prior to enactment of act was material evidence.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579—N. L. R. B. v. McLain Fire Brick Co., C.C.A.3, 128 F.2d 393.

(2) Hostility to outside unions prior to enactment of statute and preference for a company union unless later unequivocally repudiated was considered in determining whether employer has been guilty of unfair labor practices.—Atlas Underwear Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.6, 116 F.2d 1020.

Evidence of unfair practices occurring prior to posting of notices by employer in compliance with order of board was admissible in subsequent proceeding.—N. L. R. B. v. Kohen-Ligon-Folz, Inc., C.C.A.5, 128 F.2d 502.

the facts proved,[72] and the possibility of drawing either of two inferences from the evidence does not prevent the board from drawing one of them.[73] The board may credit its own witnesses to the exclusion of others.[74] Statements of employers or of employees generally can have no rational probative force as evidence in a proceeding before the board except when such statements relate directly to a factual issue before the board.[75] There is no legal justification for the rejection of the testimony of a witness where it is not inherently improbable and is substantially supported by other evidence.[76]

Where the statute provides that the rules of evidence prevailing in the courts shall be followed, the party on whom the burden of proof rests is required to sustain such burden by a clear and satisfactory preponderance of the evidence.[77]

The evidence in proceedings before labor relations boards, including the National Labor Relations Board, to prevent unfair labor practices has been held in various cases to be sufficient to sustain the order of the board;[78] or sufficient or insufficient with respect to particular matters,[79] such as closed shop agreements,[80] whether a certain person is an employer[81] or employee,[82] whether an employer is engaged in interstate commerce or his activities af-

a finding[3] under various circumstances that the employer's unfair labor practices caused or prolonged a strike; or sufficient to sustain a finding of the board that the union and its officers have committed unfair labor practices;[4] or sufficient to warrant the board's finding that the union or its members were not guilty of unfair labor practices.[5]

The proof of unfair labor practices may be by circumstantial, as well as by direct, evidence;[6] but the circumstantial evidence must be sufficient to permit a reasonable inference of a violation of the law.[7] The board may not disregard the uncontradicted testimony of unimpeached and credible witnesses.[8] The mere rejection by the board of the employer's denials as perjury does not take the place of affirmative evidence of his wrongdoing.[9] A finding of unfair labor practices may be supported when the evidence is taken as a whole and a number of related incidents considered, notwithstanding instances in the conduct of the employer, if taken separately and considered in isolation, might be insufficient.[10]

Anti-union bias on the part of the employer is not of itself sufficient proof of an unfair labor practice, but where there is clear proof of such bias it may be considered by the board for the color and point it gives to speech and action, otherwise equivocal and of doubtful meaning.[11]

Where the evidence indicates a desire by the employer to thwart or nullify unionizing efforts, either generally or as to a particular employee organization, a broad scope of inference is open to the board on questions of motive and discrimination.[12] Where an employer posts printed statements of its wages and labor terms but refuses to sign an agreement with the union representing the employees embodying those terms, the inference that the employer did not wish to deal with and would not recognize the union may be considered on the issue of unfair labor practices.[13] Where an employer has continued unfair labor practices after a settlement has been made and in disregard of the specific terms of the settlement, the board may consider the unfair labor practices occurring before the date of the agreement on the question of the board's right to enter an order against further violations.[14]

In recognition of the difficulty of proving that the conduct of employees in proposing to the employer that they would abandon the union if granted a rise in wages was voluntary, the board, in determining whether acceptance by the employer of such an offer is, in a particular case, an unfair labor practice, may consider the possibility for the employer to create an appearance of having received such an offer, seemingly made spontaneously by a majority of employees, when the employer secretly played a part in inducing the offer.[15]

Acts of supervisory employees or others. Mere isolated expressions of minor supervisory employees, which appear to be nothing more than the utterance of individual views, not authorized by the employer and not of such a character or made under such circumstances as to justify the conclusion that they are an expression of the employer's policy, ordinarily do not justify a finding against the employer.[16] The fact that the evidence on which one or more of the findings complained of are based consists, in whole or in part, of statements or acts of supervisory employees not shown to be within the scope of their authority does not preclude the board from basing inferences on such evidence.[17] Where the words or deeds of the supervisory employees, taken in their setting, were reasonably likely to have restrained the employee and if the employer may fairly be said to have been responsible for them, they are a proper basis for the conclusion that the employer did interfere.[18] Evidence that certain employees left work without interference from the foremen or supervisors in order to threaten a union representative justifies a conclusion that such conduct was at least encouraged and approved by the employer.[19] In evaluating the acts and conduct of supervisory employees the board is entitled to take into account the attitude of unfriendliness to unions manifested by more authoritative officials of the employer.[20]

The evidence in various cases has been held sufficient[21] or insufficient[22] to sustain a finding that the acts or declarations of supervisory employees or others were the acts or declarations of an employer so as to charge him with an unfair labor practice, or sufficient to justify the conclusion that the employees had just cause to believe that supervisory employees were acting on behalf of the employer.[23]

Espionage. The employment of a former detective with knowledge of his past business connections and experience may arouse a suspicion of the nature of his employment, but to sustain a finding that the employer hired a labor spy the evidence must amount to more than mere suspicion and conjecture.[24] Acts of espionage of certain employees at some time and place wholly unrelated to the employer charged can form no rational basis for a finding that such employees were performing acts of the same character for the employer;[25] and the admission by the employer of labor espionage during the employment of certain employees is not sufficient to constitute a rational basis for inferring that labor espionage was continued after the discharge of such employees.[26]

Evidence of the employer's hostility to unionization, the employment of a private detective agency and the installation of an operative in the guise of a worker, the billing of union dues by the agency as expense, reports to management immediately destroyed, and the presence of the investigator at union meetings, all taken together not only sustain but compel the inference that the primary purpose of the employment of the private agency was espionage over, and surveillance of, union activities.[27] Evidence that responsible officers of the employer did not actually use the information secured through espionage and that the system was discarded without likelihood of resumption did not compel the board to find noninterference with the employees' rights.[28]

Where a witness called by the board is evasive, no imputation of concealment can be made against the employer because of the witness' failure to remember things which he could hardly have forgotten.[29]

In various cases the evidence has been held sufficient[30] or insufficient[31] to sustain a finding that the employer was guilty of espionage of union activities.

§ 28(97). —— Interference, Restraint, or Coercion of Employees

A charge of unfair labor practice consisting of interference, restraint, or coercion of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by law must be established by sufficient evidence.

Where the unfair labor practice charged before a labor relations board consists of interference, restraint, or coercion of employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the statutes, the evidence must be sufficient to prove such interference, restraint, or coercion.[32] In various cases the evidence has been held sufficient to sustain a finding of the board that the employer has interfered with, restrained, or coerced his employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by the statutes,[33] and in other cases the evidence has been held to be insufficient to sustain such a finding.[34] Likewise, in particular cases the evidence has been held sufficient to sustain a finding that the employer has not interfered with, restrained or coerced his employees,[35] or sufficient to sustain a finding that a union or individual employees have coerced and intimidated other employees.[36] In addition, the evidence has been held

Announcing retroactive wage increase

Evidence authorized conclusion that employer was guilty of unfair labor practices by announcing retroactive wage raise, which had been negotiated by union, without giving union credit and by attempting to undercut authority of union.—N. L. R. B. v. Elyria Tel. Co., C.C.A.6, 158 F.2d 868.

Circulation by employer of vote of confidence

Evidence sustained finding that automobile manufacturer circulated a "vote of confidence" in manufacturer's labor policies, and that such circulation and publication of the vote interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of rights to self-organization to join, form and assist labor organizations, and to bargain collectively.—N. L. R. B. v. Ford Motor Co., C.C.A.6, 114 F.2d 905, certiorari denied Ford Motor Co. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 621, 312 U.S. 689, 85 L.Ed. 1126.

Evidence sustained finding that contracts with individual employees were obtained as a means of defeating unionization and discouraging collective bargaining.—N. L. R. B. v. Adel Clay Products Co., C.C.A.8, 134 F.2d 342.

Evidence that company caused strike by its refusal to bargain with union representing company's plant and sawmill employees, and that company refused to end strike except on terms which would deny collective bargaining by recognizing union as representative of its members only, warranted finding of board that company had interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in exercise of their statutory rights.—N. L. R. B. v. Biles Coleman Lumber Co., C.C.A.9, 98 F.2d 18.

Evidence as to employer's use of police and change of lunch hour of female employees to prevent discussion and organizational activities and as to charges made by service manager to employees that union was communistic sustained finding that employer interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of right to organize.—N. sufficient or insufficient with respect to gifts and favors to employees,[37] employment on condition of joining a particular union[38] or pressure by employers to join a certain union,[39] lockouts,[40] and the closing down or transfer of the employer's business.[41]

In determining whether an employer has interfered with, restrained, or coerced his employees, the board is entitled to consider the facts and incidents shown by the testimony, not simply in isolation, but cumulatively and compositely as well, in arriving at its inferences and conclusions.[42] Normally, the conclusion that the employees' choice was restrained by the employer's interference must of necessity be based on the existence of conditions or circumstances which the employer created or for which he was fairly responsible, and as a result of which it may reasonably be inferred that the employees did not have complete and unfettered freedom of choice.[43] Even where assurances are made to the employees, the actions of executives may be looked to for the purpose of determining the policy of the company, for lip service to the policy and purposes of the statute is not sufficient.[44]

The failure of an employer to take affirmative steps to disabuse the minds of the employees generally of the belief that the employer favored an organization which he helped to establish and which he dominated justifies a finding that the employees were not as free as the statute demands.[45] A finding of interference, restraint, or coercion may be sustained by evidence that after efforts were made to organize a union the employer shifted certain employees to less desirable hours of employment and attempted to have employees sign letters stating that they did not wish anyone to bargain for them.[46] A general increase of wages, especially during organizational activities by the employees, is a relevant circumstance to be considered by the board and may, at least in connection with other evidence, be sufficient to sustain a finding of interference, restraint, or coercion.[47] The employer's attempt to dissuade its employees from joining or remaining in a union by shutting down the plant, or by threatening to do so, is pertinent in determining whether the employer interfered with, restrained, or coerced its employees in the exercise of their rights under the statute[48] and may be sufficient, particularly in connection with other evidence, to sustain a finding of interference, restraint, or coercion.[49]

stituted interference, restraint, and coercion of the employees is not invalidated by proof that some individual employees were not in fact coerced.[50] A finding of coercion may be sustained on sufficient evidence, although it is shown that the coercive conduct of the employer did not have its intended effect;[51] and a showing of noncoercion in one instance does not disprove an affirmative showing of coercion in another instance.[52]

Evidence that the union was unable to obtain a meeting place in the city, without evidence that the employer was responsible, does not establish interference, restraint, or coercion by the employer.[53]

§ 28(98). —— Domination of, or Interference with, Labor Organizations; Disestablishment

Domination of, or interference with, a labor organization as an unfair labor practice must be established by sufficient evidence, but the charge may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence.

Where the domination of, or interference with, a labor organization by the employer is the unfair labor practice charged before a labor relations board, the evidence must be sufficient to establish the charge.[54] The evidence in various cases has been held sufficient to sustain a finding of the board that the employer dominated or interfered with the formation or administration of a labor organization[55]

Favoritism shown company union

U.S.—Cudahy Packing Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.10, 118 F.2d 295.

Permitting circulation of petition

Board's inference that employer knew of and permitted activities of circulating petition for joining independent union during working hours and collection of dues and posting of notices was supported by substantial evidence, and fact that handbill hostile to affiliated union was posted on bulletin board subsequent to organization of independent union to support such a finding,[58] or sufficient to support a finding that the employer did not dominate or interfere with a labor organization.[59]

Domination of, and interference with, a labor organization by the employer may be established by circumstantial, as well as direct, evidence,[60] but they may not be established by mere suspicion or inference generated by a preference for one organization over another one.[61] The circumstances allegedly supporting a finding that the employer had dominated and interfered with the formation of a union is to be viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances.[62] In order to establish employer domination or support of a labor organization it is not necessary to prove overt or express words or acts of domination or support by stockholders or executive officers of the employer; it is sufficient to show covert support or domination or acts of supervisory employees and a general setup of such a nature and so carried out as reasonably to warrant the inference that the union was an employer project.[63] The statute does not require that lack of harmonious relations between employer and employees shall constitute the only possible proof of absence of employer domination.[64] In determining whether an employer's dominance of a labor organization had been terminated, evidence that a supervisor, at a supervisor's suggestion, undertook to influence certain subordinates is entitled to consideration by the board.[65] The effect on the minds of the employees of the employer's public disavowal of a dominated union ordinarily is a question of fact for the board to determine.[66]

Where there is testimony indicating the disapproval of an outside union and encouragement of an inside union, the board may infer interference with collective bargaining privileges and domination of the inside union.[67] The comparison of speed in negotiating and contracting with contending unions is evidentiary in showing interference or assistance, at least when considered with other acts.[68] The quick execution of a closed-shop agreement when the employer knew that a rival labor organization claimed to represent a majority of employees is itself evidential of the employer's assistance to the contracting union.[69] Where a lawyer who subsequently represented the employer assisted in the formation of a union, the failure of the employer to show what its connection with the lawyer was is significant.[70]

Circumstances to be considered

Facts that employees' association hired its own attorney, collected dues, held regular meetings off employer's property, elected officers and received no financial assistance from employer, and that association negotiated collective bargaining contract and disposed of certain grievances and obtained various plant improvements were only part of evidence which board was entitled to appraise in determining whether association was employer dominated.—New Idea v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 117 F.2d 517.

Common types of domination

While the indicia of company participation or domination may be numerous, the following are the more or less common types: "(1) Organization of a union to 'succeed' or 'continue' a Company union which suspended immediately after Supreme Court decision upholding the National Labor Relations Act . . .; (2) organization on Company time and property; (3) lack of dues, and support by mere contributions; (4) similarity in union structure between old and new unions; (5) similarity of official personnel of the former and new unions; (6) failure of the Company to 'broadcast' to all employees its impartiality in selection of union; (7) acts of the Company indicative of its preference for or against a particular union; (8) its maintenance of a Company union long after the enactment of the Wagner Act as indicative of the Company's attitude towards unions generally; (9) statements of all these factors are the 'imponderables which the Board was entitled to appraise' in determining whether the Company dominated and fostered the new union."—Texas Co. v. board as to the formation of an independent union, which testimony is consistent and uncontradicted and which shows no unlawful domination of or assistance to, the independent union by the employer, may not be overridden by suspicion or by slight circumstances that may be given another color.[71] The fact that a former labor organization had been dominated by the employer does not justify an inference that a subsequent organization is employer-dominated where the undisputed testimony is to the contrary.[72] The fact that certain representatives of an earlier employer-dominated union participated in the organization of a subsequent labor organization does not establish that the subsequent organization is employer-dominated.[73] The fact that employees choose unaffiliated associations is in itself no evidence that such associations are not genuine unions or that the choice is dominated, interfered with, or coerced;[74] the fact that employees express a dislike for organized labor does not indicate that they must be acting for management.[75] Domination or interference by the employer may not be inferred from the fact that the employer refused to post a notice to the effect that it did not care whether its employees joined a national labor organization[76] or from the fact that the employer paid for the services of accountants to examine membership cards of the union to ascertain whether it represented a majority of employees.[77]

Evidence that an employer welcomed the organization of an independent union and preferred such a union to any other and made haste to recognize such union is not sufficient to sustain a finding of interference, domination, and support.[78] The fact that a temporary committee of an inside union informed the employer that a permanent organization would be created if the employer would recognize the union is insufficient to establish that the employer had aided the employees in the organization.[79]

Evidence that an independent union, without suggestion or assistance from the employer, expelled from its membership a member of a national union does not establish discrimination by the employer in the absence of evidence that the member's employment was affected.[80]

Disestablishment of union. Whether the continued recognition by the employer of a dominated union constitutes a continuing obstacle to the exercise of the employees' right of self organization and to bargain collectively is an inference of fact which the board may draw if there is evidence to support it.[81] In various cases it has been held that the evidence justified[82] or failed to justify[83] the order of the board requiring the employer to withdraw all recognition of the dominated union and to give appropriate notice of the withdrawal to the employees, or sufficient to sustain a finding of the board that the employer had not disestablished a dominated union,[84] or sufficient to show that on disestablishment of a dominated union the employer properly notified its employees of the disestablishment.[85]

A union formed by a majority of employees may not be disestablished because the employer dealt with such union without a careful determination that it had such a majority[86] or because some of the majority had formerly been members of an allegedly employer-dominated organization.[87] An employer ordered to cease and desist from dominating a labor organization is under no obligation to comply with an order of a representative of the board that he disestablish the labor organization.[88]

§ 28(99). —— Discrimination Because of Union Activities

A finding of discrimination because of union affiliation or activities must have a satisfactory foundation in the evidence.

Where the unfair labor practice charged before a labor relations board consists of discrimination because of union affiliation or activities, there must be a satisfactory foundation in the evidence to support the charge.[89] The disproportionate treatment of union and nonunion workers may, under certain circumstances, be very persuasive evidence of discrimination.[90] The evidence in various cases has been held sufficient[91] or insufficient[92] to sustain a finding by the board of discrimination by the employer against the employees because of union affiliation and activities, or sufficient or insufficient to sustain a finding of discrimination against an employee because he had given testimony before the board.[93]

The evidence in various cases has been held sufficient or insufficient with respect to hire and tenure of employment[94] or any term or condition of employment[95] to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization; imposing demerits on an employee;[96] reduction in wages;[97] demotion of employees[98] or the promotion of other employees;[99] layoffs;[1] the transfer or shift of employees;[2] or forced resignations.[3]

Rehiring or reinstatement. A finding that an employee was refused reinstatement because of union affiliation or activities cannot be based on mere surmise.[4] In determining whether an employer has discriminated in refusing to reinstate striking employees, testimony of an unfriendly attitude on the part of the employer prior to the enactment of the statute prohibiting unfair labor practices may be considered, but where such testimony is uncertain and remote it carries little weight.[5] The possibility of drawing either of two inconsistent inferences with respect to the employer's motive in refusing to reemploy certain employees does not prevent the board from drawing one of them.[6]

The evidence in various cases has been held sufficient to sustain a finding that an employer refused to rehire or reinstate an employee because of union affiliation or activities,[7] or insufficient to sustain such

Where the unfair labor practice charged consists of the dismissal of an employee because of his union affiliation or activities, the evidence must be sufficient to establish that union affiliation or activities were the real and actual cause for the discharge.

Where in a proceeding before a labor relations board it is charged as an unfair labor practice that an employee was dismissed because of union affiliation or activities, the evidence must be sufficient to show that his union activities constituted the real and actual cause for his discharge.[13] In various cases the evidence has been held sufficient to sustain the finding of the board that an employee was discharged because of union affiliation or activities,[14]

Particular contentions

The evidence has been held sufficient in particular cases as against a contention that discharge was for:

(1) Inefficiency, rule breaking, incompetency, or insubordination.—N. L. R. B. v. Bradford Dyeing Ass'n, 60 S.Ct. 918, 310 U.S. 318, 84 L.Ed. 1226—N. L. R. B. v. (2) Intoxication solely.—N. L. R. B. v. Arcade-Sunshine Co., 118 F.2d 49, 73 App.D.C. 128, certiorari denied Arcade-Sunshine Co. v. N. L. R. B., 61 S.Ct. 942, 313 U.S. 567, 85 L.Ed. 1526.

(3) Kicking another employee.—N. L. R. B. v. Revlon Products Corporation, C.C.A.2, 144 F.2d 88.

(4) Lack of work.—N. L. R. B. v. Vail Mfg. Co., C.C.A.7, 158 F.2d 664 —N. L. R. B. v. Van Deusen, C.C.A. 2, 138 F.2d 893.

(5) Reason that employee went on vacation and did not return or indicate willingness to return.—N. L. R. B. v. Bradford Dyeing Ass'n, 60 S. Ct. 918, 310 U.S. 318, 84 L.Ed. 1226.

(6) Slackness of work and frivolous behavior.—N. L. R. B. v. Condenser Corporation of America, C.C. A.3, 128 F.2d 67.

Refusal to act as strikebreakers

U.S.—Rapid Roller Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 126 F.2d 452, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 45, 317 U.S. 650, 87 L.Ed. 523.

Fact that employee was discharged soon after election as president of local chapter of labor union sustained finding that discharge was discriminatory.—Hartsell Mills Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 111 F.2d 291.

Where discharged employee had been a picket and had acted as secretary of union, and there was testimony that plant superintendent had said that his union activities would cause his discharge, board was authorized to find that he was discharged for union activities.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, or insufficient to sustain such a finding;[15] and in various cases the evidence has been held suffi-

Where employer discharged satisfactory workman who had been active in trying to stop a strike vote being taken by the employer, board was authorized to find that he was discharged for such activity.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S. Ct. 1046, 304 U.S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. Where discharged employee was officer of union, and had been over ten years in employer's employ, and one to whom he applied for loan told him, after interviewing his immediate boss, that he would never be taken back, board was justified in finding that he was discharged for union activity.—N. L. R. B. v. Remington Rand, C.C.A.2, 94 F.2d 862, certiorari denied Remington Rand v. N. L. R. B., 58 S.Ct. 1046, 304 U. S. 576, 82 L.Ed. 1540, rehearing denied Remington Rand v. U. Discharge because of want of union work permit

Evidence supported state board's finding that employer was guilty of unfair labor practices in discharging employees for not being members of, or having work permits from, labor union, as required by collective bargaining contract therewith, so as to encourage membership in union.—International Union, United Automobile, Aircraft & Agricultural Implement Workers of America v. cient[16] or insufficient[17] to sustain a finding of discriminatory discharge because an employee had given testimony in a proceeding before the board.

In ascertaining whether an employee was discharged because of union activities the board may consider circumstantial, as well as direct, evidence,[18] but when circumstantial evidence is relied on there must be evidence of circumstances from which the board may conclude with reasonable certainty that the employee was discharged because of union activity.[19] The board may draw inferences from the facts proved.[20] The fact that some of the evidence relating to a discriminatory discharge was hearsay affords no basis for objecting to the finding of the board.[21] However, mere suspicion or conjecture alone is not sufficient on which to base a finding of discriminatory discharge.[22]

The mere discharge of an employee with or without reason is not evidence of an intent to affect labor unions or the right of employees.[23] The fact that a discharged employee may be engaged in labor union activities at the time of his discharge, taken alone, is not sufficient evidence of a discharge as a result of such activities.[24]

Where the employee admits dereliction in complying with the employer's rule, the board should not lightly infer that such dereliction was not the cause of the discharge.[25] Even though an employer disavows under oath that employees were discharged because of union activities, if he can assign no other credible motive or cause he need not be believed, but if the employer assigns a legitimate reason for the discharge, his oath cannot be disregarded because of suspicion that he may be lying; there must be impeachment of him, or substantial contradiction, or, if circumstances raise doubts, they must be inconsistent with the positive sworn evidence on the exact point.[26] The fact that the employer's explanation does not stand up under scrutiny strengthens the inference drawn by the board from other

Abolition of department

Where employee was discharged when employer abolished department in which employee was working, evidence failed to support finding of board that employer was guilty of unfair labor practice in discharging employee, notwithstanding employee did some work in other departments.—New York State Labor Relations Board v. Carelessness of employee

Evidence that longshoremen holding most responsible positions in gang were guilty of carelessness which was inexcusable in men of their experience and that they were put back to work after their discharge on agreement voluntarily made on their part was insufficient to support board's finding that their discharge was for union activities.—Agwilines, Inc. v. Corroboration by employee

When employer, wholly unimpeached, testifies under oath to his reasons for discharging employee, board cannot find that employee was discharged for union activities, especially when employee testifies that he was discharged for failure to perform work.—N. L. R. B. v. Sheboygan Chair Co., C.C.A.7, 125 F.2d 436.

Fact that employee who was discharged was hired in other plants during war man-power shortage did not afford sound basis for ignoring undisputed testimony of supervisors that they were dissatisfied with such employee's work.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 162 F. 2d 287.

facts that the employee was discharged for union activities.[27]

The failure of the employer to give a reason for the discharge, or the giving of evasive or contradictory reasons, may be considered by the board in determining the employer's motive.[28] The failure of the employer to give an explanation for the discharge of an employee of many years' service is a circumstance indicating that the discharge was for union activities.[29] The discharge of an employee without notice contrary to the well-established practice of the employer is cogent evidence of discrimination.[30] The fact that the employer offers a discharged employee a temporary job subsequent to the filing of charges before the board does not establish the employer's good faith in discharging him.[31]

The employer's hostility toward any union and his determined effort to defeat the organization of his employees into a union must be considered in determining whether an active union member was discharged for his union activities when no other satisfactory reason for the discharge appears.[32] The employer's opposition to a union and discharges of employees who are members are not sufficient to justify a finding of discriminatory discharges unless such discharges are motivated by such opposition,[33] but such a situation warrants a critical attitude and may justify unfavorable inferences where the evidence is not clear as to whether or not there was discrimination because of such opposition.[34] The fact that a large per cent of the employees discharged belonged to the union is not alone sufficient to establish discriminatory discharges, but, coupled with other evidence, it becomes very persuasive.[35] The inference that union membership was discouraged by an employee's discharge is not unfounded merely because a closed-shop agreement was in existence and because the discharged employee continued to be a member of the union.[36] It has been held that a refusal to bargain collectively with a union is sufficient, in the absence of any other satisfactory reason, to support a finding of discrimination in the discharge of an employee.[37]

Reinstatement by order of board. The evidence to justify an order of reinstatement with back pay of employees discriminatorily discharged should be substantial, and surmise or suspicion, even though reasonable, is not sufficient.[38] In various cases it has been held that the evidence justified[39] or failed

§ 28(101). —— Refusal to Bargain Collectively

Where the unfair labor practice charged consists of a refusal to engage in collective bargaining, the evidence must be sufficient to show a refusal to bargain collectively in good faith.

Where the unfair labor practice charged in a proceeding before a labor relations board consists of a refusal to bargain collectively, the evidence must be sufficient to show a refusal to engage in good faith in collective bargaining.[41] In various cases the evidence has been held sufficient to sustain a finding that the employer has refused to bargain collectively in good faith with the authorized representatives of his employees[42] or insufficient to sustain such a

Inference of bad faith

(1) Employer's hostility to union, threats by supervisory employees, and president's refusal to participate in conferences showed determined course of deliberate noncompliance with statute from which an inference of bad faith could be drawn.—Great Southern Trucking Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 127 F.2d 180, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 48, 317 U.S. 652, 87 L.Ed. 524.

(3) Employer's wish to lower minimum wage schedule, provided for in proposed collective bargaining agreement, did not warrant inference that employer failed to bargain in good faith.—N. L. R. B. v. Knoxville Pub. Co., supra.

(4) Newspaper publishing company's rejection of portion of proposed collective bargaining contract, concerning employment which should be included, did not warrant inference that company refused to bargain in good faith.—N. L. R. B. v. Knoxville Pub. Co., supra.

(5) Publishing company's insistence that certain positions be excluded from terms of proposed collective bargaining agreement did not warrant an inference of bad faith.—N. L. R. B. v. Knoxville Pub. Co., supra.

c. Hearings, Findings, Determinations, and Orders

§ 28(102). Administrative Hearings

Persons whose rights may be adversely affected by administrative proceedings with respect to unfair labor practices are entitled to a hearing thereon.

Persons whose rights may be adversely affected by administrative proceedings taken under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, with respect to unfair labor practices, are entitled to a hearing thereon.[48] Such a hearing must be fair,[49] and is quasi-judicial, rather than executive, in character.[50] The test of a fair hearing has been held to be whether the issues are clearly defined, so that respondent may address himself to the charges made against him,[51] although, as discussed supra § 28 (91), the trial and determination of an issue not clearly raised by the pleadings have been held not to be error where the parties are afforded ample time to meet the issue. A hearing is not rendered unfair to respondent by his refusal to summon any witnesses or present any evidence,[52] by the fact that the employees' witnesses were credited and the employer's were not,[53] or by the board's failure to submit its proposed findings and order to respondent before adopting them,[54] and one is not necessarily deprived of a fair hearing because the board's procedure deviated from its prescribed rules of practice.[55] A requirement that a party submit evidence on his own behalf at his own expense is fair.[56] The right to a hearing is not infringed by the board's employment of subordinates to sift and analyze the evidence and the law.[57] Mere recitals in the decision and order of the board are Parties to proceeding see supra §§ 28 (82)–28 (86).

Employees' organizations

(1) In a proceeding in which it is asserted that an employees' organization is employer-dominated and relief is sought against the employer recognizing, bargaining with, or dominating and supporting such organization, the organization is not entitled to a hearing.—N. L. R. B. v. Pennsylvania Greyhound Lines, 58 S.Ct. 571, 303 U.S. 261, 82 L.Ed. 831, 115 A.L.R. 307—Solvay Process Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 117 F.2d 83, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1121, 313 U.S. 596, 85 L.Ed. 1549.

(2) Where, however, it is sought to have the employer cease recognizing and enforcing a contract with an independent labor organization, which is not employer dominated, the employees' organization is entitled to notice and a hearing.—Consolidated Edison Co. of New York v. N. L. R. B., N.Y., 59 S.Ct. 206, 305 U.S. 197, 83 L.Ed. 126—N. L. R. B. v. Cowell Portland Cement Co., C.C.A.9, 108 F.2d 198.

Specific measures of relief

Where an employer has had a full and fair hearing on the unfair labor practices charged, he is not entitled to a further hearing on the specific measures of relief which the board determines should be taken.—N. L. R. B. v. Weirton Steel Co., C.C.A.3, 135 F.2d 494.

Hearing held fair

Hearing on all issues

The procedural action of the board must conform to standards of fairness and reasonableness, with due notice of and opportunity to be heard on all points properly in issue.—Jefferson Electric Co. v. N. L. R. B., C. C.A.7, 102 F.2d 949.

50. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Prettyman, C.C.A.6, 117 F.2d 786—Bradley Lumber Co. of Arkansas v. National Labor Relations Board, C.C.A. La., 84 F.2d 97, certiorari denied 57 S.Ct. 21, 299 U.S. 559, 81 L.Ed. 411.

Independent investigation by board

Where proceeding before state labor relations board was tried solely on issue whether union had a majority, it was improper for the board to make its investigation on any other theory without giving parties an opportunity to meet such theory notwithstanding stipulation that board might make its own investigation, since parties to stipulation were entitled to rely on assumption that board would conduct investigation pursuant to announced issue in the case.—International Union of Operating Engineers, Local No. 354 v. Industrial Commission of Utah, 119 P.2d 243, 101 Utah 139.

Hearing must be in accord with charge, in an attempt to prove or rebut such charge.—N. L. R. B. v. Hopwood Retinning Co., C.C.A.2, 98 F.2d 97.

Opportunity to meet claim

The right to a hearing embraces a reasonable opportunity to learn of and meet opposing claims.—Valley Mould & Iron Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 116 F.2d 760, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1114, 313 U.S. 590, 85 L.Ed. 1545.

Report and complaint

On argument before the board, the report of the trial examiner, coupled with the complaint stating the charges, was sufficient indication to the respondent of what it was required to meet.—Cupples Co. Manufacturers v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 103 F.2d 953.

Under state statute

Personal examination by each member of state labor relations board of all testimony as a prerequisite to a determination of a labor dispute is not an essential, and members of board are entitled to avail themselves of services of competent assistants in sifting and analyzing the proof.—New York State Labor Relations Bd. v. Greif Realty Corp., 71 N.Y.S.2d 91, 272 App.Div. 928.

not in themselves evidence of a substantial compliance with the law requiring a fair hearing.[58]

Place of hearing. Under the National Labor Relations Act the board may meet and exercise its power in any part of the United States, and within reasonable limits the board has discretion as to the place where the hearing is to be held;[59] but this does not give the board an uncontrolled discretion as to the place of holding hearings,[60] and the hearing must be held at a place convenient to all of the parties.[61]

Reopening case. After the report of the hearing officer or trial examiner, it is within the board's discretion to reopen or to refuse to reopen the case for further proceedings[62] or for the receipt of new evidence,[63] particularly after its findings and decisions have been made.[64]

§ 28(103). —— Scope of Inquiry

The extent to which a labor relations board may refuse to go into a matter raised by the complaint because the matter is stale or because it has been satisfactorily concluded rests in the board's discretion.

Although, as discussed supra § 28 (91) as a general rule the issues in a proceeding before a labor board are confined to those raised by the pleadings, the board is not prevented from considering unfair labor practices which are related to those alleged in the charge and which grew out of them while the proceeding was pending before the board.[65] The board is not required, however, to sidetrack proceedings involving an unfair labor practice in order to explore irrelevant matters,[66] and the board in determining whether unfair labor practices were committed need not consider and determine the cause of such practices.[67]

The extent to which the board may refuse to go into a matter raised by the complaint because the matter is stale or because it has been satisfactorily concluded rests in the board's discretion.[68] The discontinuance of an unfair labor practice does not preclude the board from taking action with respect to it;[69] and an unobserved agreement by an employer to refrain from certain unfair labor practices does not prevent the board from considering the employer's conduct before the agreement in connection with subsequent unfair practices.[70]

The board has discretion to refuse to reconsider an issue which was determined in a prior proceeding involving the same parties,[71] or even where all of the present parties were not parties to the prior proceeding where the issue is only collateral,[72] and to proceed on the basis of the knowledge acquired in such proceeding,[73] particularly where there is no showing that the proposed evidence was not introduced or available at the prior proceeding.[74]

§ 28(104). —— Who May Conduct Hearing

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the hearing may be conducted by the board, a member of the board, or an agent of the board.

29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (b), and similar statutes, the hearing may be conducted by the board, any member of the board, or any agent designated by the board.[75] It is not essential that the board or any member thereof be personally present and hear the testimony of the witnesses;[76] nor need the board have heard or read all of the evidence presented.[77] The hearings under the National Labor Relations Act are generally conducted by a trial examiner, who is an agent of the board[78] to gather the facts and make recommendation to the board in an intermediate report.[79]

Bias and prejudice. The person conducting the hearing should not be biased or prejudiced,[80] and, where the trial examiner's conduct clearly evidences bias and prejudice, the parties have not had a fair hearing;[81] but it has been held that the improper conduct of a trial examiner is not a denial of a fair hearing where the decision is correct and the case is not a close one,[82] and that the bias of the examiner does not warrant upsetting the decision of the board where it is not shown that the party complaining has been prejudiced by the bias.[83] A trial examiner is not disqualified because he was reversed on his earlier hearing of the cause, and such fact does not render the board's denial of a party's request for a different examiner improper.[84]

§ 28(105). —— Conduct of Hearing

The person conducting the hearing is vested with a broad discretion as to the general conduct thereof.

As a general rule under the labor relations statutes, the official conducting the hearing or the trial examiner is vested with a broad discretion as to the general conduct of the hearing, but his exercise of that power should reflect a reasonable effort to enable all the parties to present their theory of what happened.[85] The person conducting the hearing has some discretion as to the reception of evidence[86]

Authority to hear testimony

The trial examiner had authority to hear testimony, notwithstanding order of board designating trial examiner was not introduced in evidence.—N. L. R. B. v. J. S. Popper, Inc., C.C.A.3, 113 F.2d 602.

Substitution

The trial examiner is the agent of the board and examiners may be substituted at the will of board during course of proceeding.—N. L. R. B. v. Botany Worsted Mills, C.C.A.3, 133 F.2d 876, certiorari denied Botany Worsted Mills v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 1164, two cases, 319 U.S. 751, 87 L. Ed. 1705.

"Audi alteram partem"

A hearing before board is invalid, where the maxim, Audi alteram partem, is ignored.—Continental Box Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 113 F.2d 93.

Bias not established

The trial examiner was not guilty of bias or prejudice in permitting receipt of evidence showing employer guilty of espionage.—N. L. R. B. v. Acme-Evans Co., C.C.A.7, 130 F.2d 477, certiorari denied Acme-Evans Co. v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 769, 318 U.S. 772, 87 L.Ed. 1142, rehearing denied 63 S.Ct. 851, 318 U.S. 802, 87 L.Ed. 1166.

Distant relation to person interested

The fact that examiner was distantly related to one of firm representing employer did not affect order of board.—N. L. R. B. v. Garfunkel, C.C.A.2, 162 F.2d 256.

81. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Washington Dehydrated Food Co., C.C.A.9, 118 F.2d 980.

Partial agreement with employer

Good faith of trial examiner and the board was attested by fact that in five out of eleven charges they agreed with employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Gallup American Coal Co., C.C.A. 10, 131 F.2d 665.

85. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Burke Mach. Tool Co., C.C.A.6, 133 F.2d 618.

The board may exclude from its hearings counsel guilty of contemptuous conduct.—N. L. R. B. v. Weirton Steel Co., C.C.A.3, 135 F.2d 494.

Extension of hearing

Where attorney for employer, relying on practice of board to receive hearsay testimony, had not brought a witness to hearing but as time for adjournment had arrived attorney offered to produce witness on following day to give testimony which would go to very heart of case, refusal to extend hearing for such purpose was unreasonable.—N. L. R. B. v. Fairchild Engine & Airplane Corporation, C.C.A.4, 145 F.2d 214.

Refusal to summon witness

A hearing is not rendered unfair by a refusal to summon a witness in order that he may be asked irrelevant questions.—Bethlehem Steel Co. v. N. L. R. B., 120 F.2d 641, 74 App. D.C. 52.

Refusal to receive evidence

(1) Where a continuance was obtained solely for the presentation of certain testimony, it was an abuse of discretion to refuse to receive other testimony which was important and which would not involve an undue delay in concluding the hearings.—Consolidated Edison Co. of New York v. N. L. R. B., N.Y., 59 S.Ct. 206, 305 U.S. 197, 83 L.Ed. 126.

(2) Rejection of cumulative testimony was not an abuse of discretion or deprivation of a fair hearing.

and may exercise a reasonable discretion in controlling the order of proof,[87] but he should, within reasonable limits, permit each of the parties to prove his own case in his own way by his own counsel.[88] The separation of witnesses is a matter within the discretion of the one conducting the hearing,[89] but, where it appears that the testimony of witnesses will be in sharp conflict, it has been held to be improvident to deny a timely request for the separation of the witnesses.[90]

It is the function of the person conducting the hearing or of the trial examiner to see that the facts are fully and clearly developed[91] and, to that end, it is proper for him to ask questions and elicit testimony,[92] to call witnesses and introduce evidence,[93] and he has broad authority to accept evidence and make findings unfettered by the strict rules of judicial inquiry.[94]

The trial examiner should accept and have recorded all of the evidence offered by any of the parties, including evidence he rules inadmissible, unless it is palpably incompetent,[95] and he may not deny a party's request to have its own reporter present to take and transcribe the proceeding.[96] The matter of making a record of the argument of counsel is within the discretion of the one conducting the hearing.[97] Failure to have "off-the-record" statements recorded does not establish bias by the trial examiner; nor is it prejudicial error.[98]

§ 28(106). —— Trial Examiner's Report and Recommendations

Ordinarily, under the labor relations statutes, the trial examiner's report and recommendations to the labor relations board are merely advisory.

Under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 151 et seq, and similar statutes, the better practice is for the trial examiner to render a report before the transfer of the case to the board,[99] but employers charged with unfair labor practices may not complain of the transfer of the proceeding from the trial examiner to the board and its determination without a report by the trial examiner or a hearing before the board where the employer failed to request either.[1] The trial examiner's report and recommendations to the board are merely advisory;[2] the board may accept, reject, or modify his recommendations,[3] and an employer by complying with the Determination on record

The board may disregard the trial examiner's report and make its determination solely on the evidence contained in the record, and such procedure does not deny respondent a fair hearing.—N. L. R. B. v. Air Associates, C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 586.

What constitute record

examiner's recommendations does not destroy the board's jurisdiction to proceed further in the matter.[4] As discussed infra § 28 (108), the statute imposes on the board the duty of making findings of fact, and the board may not delegate the duty to a trial examiner, but must treat his report as merely a recommendation,[5] and may make independent findings contrary to those recommended in the report,[6] even though the recommended findings have not been objected to by the parties,[7] and this applies even on a question of the credibility of witnesses.[8] However, it has been held that, where the board makes findings contrary to those made by the examiner, the examiner's report has a bearing on the question whether the findings are substantially supported by the evidence,[9] particularly where a minority of the board agrees with the examiner.[10]

§ 28(107). Administrative Determination of Issues

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the board has the power to determine questions of fact.

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the board has the power to determine questions of fact,[11] to draw inferences from the facts,[12] appraise conflicting and circumstantial evidence,[13] and to determine the weight and credibility of testimony,[14] and as discussed infra § 28 (136), such determinations are not subject to judicial review, since it is for the board and not the courts to make such determinations. The board may properly weigh and appraise the totality of the situation presented by the evidence,[15] may detect and appraise imponderables permeating the record,[16] and may find support for its findings in the whole congeries of facts before it.[17] However, the board

Conflict between employer's and employees' interests

The National Labor Relations Board must weigh the conflicts which arise from time to time between employer and employee out of the exercise of the employee's right to full freedom in self-organizational activities, and must determine in each case whether the interest of the employees or the interest of the employers should be held paramount.—N. L. R. B. v. Illinois Tool Works, C.C.A.7, 153 F.2d 811.

Unfair practices

The board has power to determine whether unfair labor practices were committed.—National Licorice Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 569, 309 U.S. 350, 84 L.Ed. 799—N. L. R. B. v. Hopwood Retinning Co., C.C.A.2, 98 F.2d 97.

Under state statute

The function of a Labor Relations Board has been held to be to appraise conflicting evidence, determine the credibility of witnesses, resolve primary issues of fact, and draw inferences from the established facts and circumstances.—Pennsylvania Labor Relations Board v. Kaufmann Department Stores, 29 A.2d 90, 345 Pa. 398.

Discriminatory discharge

Board, in arriving at its conclusion on question whether employer discriminatorily discharged two employees because of their union activities, properly viewed the picture as a whole and properly considered a number of related incidents.—Oman v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 139 F. 2d 728.

must consider all of the evidence[18] and may not disregard undisputed evidence which does not support its findings.[19] Since the board has such great power with respect to the determination of the facts, it should be scrupulously careful to see that the power is exercised with a commensurate sense of what is just and fair;[20] its functions as investigator and prosecutor of charges should not be confused with its quasi-judicial duty to find and state the actual facts on the basis of substantial, credible evidence impartially weighed,[21] and the board should evaluate the evidence presented on behalf of the employer and the employees with scrupulous impartiality.[22]

In determining whether an employees' association is company-dominated, sponsored, or interfered with, the board may appraise imponderables[23] and give careful scrutiny to all factors which restrain the employees' choice and for which the employer may fairly be held responsible.[24]

Disclosure of deliberations in reaching decision. The members of the board will not be required to disclose their deliberations and actions in arriving at a decision.[25]

§ 28(108). —— Findings of Fact

Under the National Labor Relations Act and similar statutes, the board is required to make findings of fact.

The National Labor Relations Act § 10 (c), 29 U.S.C.A. § 160 (c), imposes on the National Labor Relations Board the duty of making findings of fact.[26]

An employer's attitude toward unions is relevant in determining whether employer dominated or interfered with an organization of its employees.—N. L. R. B. v. Link-Belt Co., 61 S.Ct. 358, 311 U.S. 584, 85 L. Ed. 368—N. L. R. B. v. Independent Union of Craftsmen, 61 S.Ct. 358, 311 U.S. 584, 85 L.Ed. 368.

Campaign by an employer to keep one union out of its plant will be considered in determining whether there has been such employer interference as to vitiate the employer's contracts with assisted union.—International Ass'n of Machinists, Tool and Die Makers Lodge No. 35, v. Public policy

The policy against requiring public disclosure by judges or jurors of their reasoning and actions in arriving at a decision or verdict applies as well to the judicial function of the National Labor Relations Board.—N. L. R. B. v. Botany Worsted Mills, C.C.A.3, 106 F.2d 263.

Adoption of trial examiner's findings

Where trial examiner made findings to which employer filed exceptions, and board, after considering entire record, adopted findings of examiner, board's order was not erroneous on ground that board never found the facts on which order was based.—N. L. R. B. v. Jasper Chair Co., C.C.A.7, 138 F.2d 756, certiorari denied Jasper Chair Co. v. N. L. R. B., 64 S.Ct. 618, 321 U.S. 777, 88 L. Ed. 1070.

Preparation by employees

The preparation of findings of fact and conclusions of law by employees or subordinates of the board did not constitute denial of due process.—

The making of findings of facts may be waived[27] as where the parties stipulate the sole issue to be that of the board's jurisdiction.[28] The board need only find the ultimate facts;[29] it need not recite all of the evidence,[30] or even all of the undisputed evidence,[31] and it need not set forth conflicts in the evidence[32] or relate facts contrary or irrelevant to the finding made.[33]

Findings as to the ultimate facts required by the statute may be based on other findings.[34] A finding that a labor organization does not represent an uncoerced majority of the employees is adequate to support the conclusion that the maintenance as well as the acquisition of the majority was contaminated by the employer's aid and justifies the board in refusing to give effect to a closed-shop contract.[35]

Conformity to pleadings. In a general way the findings must conform to the pleadings,[36] but technical differences between the findings and the pleadings do not invalidate the proceeding where the parties at all times understand the real nature of the issues.[37] A finding as to unfair practices is sufficiently supported by an allegation of unfair practices "by other acts" where there has been no surprise and the employer presents evidence with respect to such acts.[38]

Support by evidence. The findings must be based on evidence testified to by witnesses who are subject to cross-examination,[39] but this rule does not require evidence as to the results which may flow from such evidentiary facts;[40] nor does it bar the board from drawing reasonable inferences and conclusions from the evidence produced.[41]

Form of findings. It is not necessary that the

Jurisdictional facts

A finding that a labor union which filed a charge of unfair labor practices was a labor organization within meaning of statute was jurisdictional.—N. L. R. B. v. Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., C.C.A.6, 124 F.2d 50, affirmed 63 S.Ct. 394, 317 U.S. 9, 87 L.Ed. 579.

Findings on stipulated evidence

Where no evidence was offered at hearing on unfair labor practice charge against employer but it was stipulated that evidence which had previously been offered in representation proceeding should be considered, the board, with record of both proceedings before it, had right to make further findings as it deemed appropriate, in unfair labor practice proceeding.—N. L. R. B. v. E. C. Atkins & Co., C.C.A.7, 147 F.2d 730, vacated on other grounds 65 S.Ct. 1413, 325 U.S. 838, 89 L.Ed. 1965, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 13, 326 U.S. 804, 90 L.Ed. 490, reinstated, C.C.A., 155 F.2d 567, reversed on other grounds 67 S.Ct. 1265.

Construction of finding board make its findings in any formal style;[42] it is sufficient if it makes findings which clearly and definitely state the basic facts on which its ultimate conclusion and decision rest.[43] A finding as to an ultimate fact need not be express where it is necessarily implied in other findings.[44]

Under state statutes similar to the National Labor Relations Act the boards established by such statutes are required to make findings,[45] and it has been held that the findings should state the ultimate facts rather than the evidentiary facts.[46] The findings of the board must be supported by competent, material, and relevant evidence,[47] and the board may not rely on only part of the evidence and disregard other undisputed evidence.[48]

§ 28(109). Orders by State Administrative Bodies

Under some state labor relations acts, the state board may issue appropriate orders to nullify the effects of unfair labor practices.

Under some state labor relations acts, the state board is authorized to issue appropriate orders to nullify the effects of unfair labor practices,[49] and to order such affirmative action as is considered by the board reasonably necessary to effectuate the policies of the statute.[50] Although the board has discretion as to the relief to be awarded,[51] its order must be supported by, and in conformity with, the findings of fact,[52] and findings which would be sufficient to support a court order are sufficient to support a board order.[53]

Reinstatement and back-pay orders. Under some of the statutes the state board has the power to order an employer guilty of unfair labor practices in violation of the statute to reinstate discharged employees[56] and to pay them for the period since their discharge.[57] Reinstatement may be ordered only if the discharge involved discrimination against the employee because of the exercise of the rights guaranteed him by the statute or was the result of an unfair labor practice.[58] Relief as to an employee discharged in violation of the statute has been held not to be dependent on his application for reinstatement[59] but in the case of an employee on strike, relief has been held to be dependent on an application for reinstatement.[60] The board has considerable discretion as to the award of back pay, but the discretion is a legal discretion.[61]

It has been held that the back pay award should be limited to an amount necessary to effectuate the policies of the statute.[62] In computing the back-pay award, the amount earned in other employment

Refusal of employment

If it appeared that employee who was found by the labor relations board to have been discharged solely because she was an active union member and the chairman of the

should be deducted,[63] and back pay should not be awarded for periods during which the employee made no effort to secure employment.[64]

Unfair practices by employees or their organization. Under a state statute proscribing certain unfair labor practices committed by employees, an order may run against a labor union which "caused to be done" the unfair labor practice.[65] Where a union is found to have engaged in unfair labor practices, the board may order it to cease and desist from unfair labor practices and unlawful acts,[66] and may order it to cease publicly asserting that an employer is unfair to organized labor or to the union involved where the sole basis for such claim is the fact that the employer has refused to perform an act which the law forbids.[67] The board may act against attempted unfair practices; the fact that the union did not succeed in accomplishing its unfair objectives does not deprive the board of the power to order the union to cease such activities.[68] However, in the absence of statutory provision therefor, the board may not order the union to pay damages.[69]

An order has been held not to be prejudicial in that it is too broad and forbids unfair labor practices which the union is not shown to have committed,[70] and it has been held that an order forbidding peaceful picketing generally will not be disturbed since the order is to be construed in its context as limited to picketing to promote an unlawful purpose.[71] Where a labor union has committed an unfair labor practice by calling a strike without following the procedure prescribed by the statute, the board may order the union to cease all picketing and boycotting.[72] The union may be ordered to desist from interfering with the rights of others than the complainants, where such others are made party to

§ 28(110). Orders by Federal Administrative Bodies

The National Labor Relations Board has the power to order persons found to have violated the statute to cease and desist from unfair labor practices and to take such affirmative action as will effectuate the policies of the statute.

Under the National Labor Relations Act § 10, 29 U.S.C.A. § 160, the National Labor Relations Board has the power to order persons found to have committed unfair labor practices in violation of the statute to cease and desist from unfair labor practices[75] and to take such affirmative action as will effectuate the policies of the statute.[76] The provision of the statute conferring such power on the board is valid[77] and is to be construed in harmony with the spirit and remedial purposes of the act.[78] The board may order such affirmative action as will ensure the employees their rights,[79] as of self-organization and collective bargaining,[80] and its power to order affirmative action is not limited to ordering the reinstatement of employees.[81]

The National Labor Relations Board has wide discretion as to the orders it may issue and the relief it may direct.[82] It is for the board to determine how the effect of unfair labor practices shall be ex-

punged and the relief to be awarded,[83] and the test of its power to grant particular relief and to issue particular orders is whether such award will effectuate the policies of the statute.[84] However, the board's power is not unlimited,[85] and the board is not authorized to break some other law as a means of enforcing the statute.[86] The board does not have the power of punishment or retribution for past wrongs or errors;[87] the power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive,[88] and is to be exercised in aid of the board's authority to restrain violations and as a means of removing or avoiding the consequences of violations where those consequences are the kind to thwart the purposes of the act,[89] and is designed to enable the board to restore the status that would have existed had the unfair labor practice not been committed.[90]

The relief which the board may grant is to be adapted to the situation which calls for redress.[91] The board has the power to take appropriate steps to nullify the effect of the employer's illegal conduct and to prevent its enjoyment of any advantage gained thereby,[92] and in determining whether a particular remedy is justified, the restoration of the situation to that which would have obtained but for the commission of the unfair labor practices should be considered.[93]

Power denied by statute

The board has broad powers to require such affirmative action as will effectuate policies of National Labor Relations Act, but it cannot order any action clearly denied to it by statute.—Mooresville Cotton Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 94 F.2d 61, modified on other grounds 97 F.2d 959.

Board may not dictate terms of contract, but may only direct employer to bargain in good faith.—Singer Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 119 F.2d 131, certiorari denied 61 S.Ct. 1119, 313 U.S. 595, 85 L.Ed. 1549, rehearing denied 62 S.Ct. 55, 314 U.S. 708, 86 L.Ed. 565.

Place of bargaining

The board has authority to order corporation to bargain collectively

fering with the efforts of the accredited bargaining representative to bargain collectively.[95] The board may order affirmative remedial action not only as to contracts between employer and employees, whose terms per se violate the act,[96] but may also take such action as to contracts whose terms are fair on their face, but which in their history, execution, and existence are tainted by conduct which is condemned by the act.[97] It may order an employer not to give effect to individual contracts with his employees,[98] and to refrain from requiring his employees to contract with him not to join a labor organization.[99] The board may order the employer to cease recognizing and enforcing a contract with an employees' organization where such contract is unfair or is the consequence of unfair labor practices,[1] to embody in a written agreement the contract it has made with the employees' representative,[2] and to afford its employees reasonable protection from physical violence.[3] The board may order the suppression or discontinuance of oppressive acts against employees, even though the employer's management is entirely ignorant of such acts.[4]

Nature of orders. The board's orders are not private awards but are public reparation orders,[5] and are for the enforcement of public, not of private, rights.[6]

Form of order. The orders of the National Labor Relations Board should be explicit[7] and must state with reasonable specificity the acts which respondent is to do or refrain from doing.[8] through union in city wherein plant is located, instead of distant city wherein corporation's main executives' offices are.—N. L. R. B. v. P. Lorillard Co., C.C.A.6, 117 F.2d 921, reversed on other grounds 62 S.Ct. 397, 314 U.S. 512, 86 L.Ed. 380.

Specified organization

In an unfair labor practices proceeding the board may not only order the employer to cease and desist from the complained of practices, but it may go further and direct the employer to bargain with a specified labor organization, even though another organization, which the employer improperly favored, claims that it has been designated by a majority of the employees.—International Ass'n of Machinists, Tool and Die Makers Lodge No. 35, v. N. L. R. B., App.D.C., 61 S.Ct. 83, 311 U.S. 72, 85 L.Ed. 50, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 314, 311 U.S. 729, 85 L.Ed. 474.

Fruits of unfair practices

Where contracts between employer and employees were the fruits of unfair labor practices, and were a continuing means of thwarting the policy of the statute, the contracts were appropriate subjects for affirmative remedial action by board.—National Licorice Co. v. N. L. R. B., 60 S.Ct. 569, 309 U.S. 350, 84 L.Ed. 799.

Right to strike

An order to cease giving effect to closed shop contract with one union and to bargain with exclusive bargaining representative was not objectionable as interfering with first union's right to strike.—N. L. R. B. v. John Engelhorn & Sons, C.C.A.3, 134 F.2d 553.

Contracts not unfair or fruit of unfair practices

Where there was no basis for a finding that labor contracts between employers and favored but not company-dominated union were a consequence of unfair labor practices or that contracts in themselves thwarted any policy of the National Labor Relations Act or that their cancellation would in any way make the order to cease specified unfair practices any more effective, the board had no authority to require employers to desist from giving effect to contracts.—Consolidated Edison Co. of N. Protection of employees from violence

An order directing employer to afford all its employees reasonable protection at all times from physical assaults or threats of physical violence directed at discouraging membership in unions was not fatally defective because of indefiniteness.—N. L. R. B. v. General Motors Corporation, C.C.A.7, 116 F.2d 306.

Refusal to bargain

An order determining that employer has refused to bargain in good faith and directing it to cease and desist from such refusal is not objectionable as vague and indefinite. —Singer Mfg. Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.

within which the board must make its order[9] and complaint may not be made of a delay which is not unreasonable,[10] but, where the delay is unreasonable, circumstances excusing the delay should be shown,[11] since, as discussed infra § 28 (125), laches in reaching a decision may bar enforcement of the order.

Service of order. The statute requires that the board serve the order on the persons affected thereby, but a liberal, practical view will be taken as to the sufficiency of the compliance with this provision.[12]

§ 28(111). —— Scope of Order

a. In general
b. Restriction to issues and pleadings
c. Restriction to evidence and findings

a. In General

The national labor relations board may restrain any unlawful practice which it has found the employer to have committed, but it may not issue a blanket order forbidding any acts in violation of the statute unless the board may reasonably conclude from the evidence that such an order is necessary.

The scope of the orders of the National Labor Relations Board is of importance,[13] since, unlike violations of the statute, violations of the board's orders, when enforced by judicial decree, may be punished as contempt, as discussed infra § 28 (142).

The board has authority to restrain the unlawful practice which it has found the employer to have committed[14] and other like or related unlawful acts,[15] but not other unlawful acts which the em-

Union solicitation

An order directing department store to rescind rule in so far as it prohibited union solicitation off the selling floor during nonworking hours was not so vague and unworkable as to be invalid; nor was it invalid because of circumstance that store had chosen to allow its employees to use washrooms and restrooms open to the public, instead of private facilities.—N. Discretion

Question whether board on finding unfair labor practices by employer should restrain employer from committing other related unlawful acts is a matter for the informed discretion of the board.—N. L. R. B. v. Sun Tent-Luebbert Co., C.C.A.9, 151 F.2d 483, opinion supplemented 154 F.2d 108.

Interference with self-organization

(1) Board properly prohibited, generally, any interference with the right of self-organization and not merely the particular kind of interference covered by finding against employer.—N. L. R. B. v. American Oil Co. (Curtis Bay Plant), C.C.A.4, 114 F.2d 1009.

(2) A cease and desist order restraining employers organization from interfering with labor organization of employees is not too broad because it restrains similar acts of the corporation with employers other than ones with whom corporation was found to have committed unfair labor practices, where danger of commission of such violations in future could be anticipated from course of corporation's conduct in the past.—N. L. R. B. v. Sun Tent-Luebbert Co., C.C.A.9, 151 F.2d 483, opinion supplemented 154 F.2d 108.

Protection from violence

An order directing employer to afford employees reasonable protection from physical assaults or threats of physical violence directed at discouraging membership in unions was not objectionable as being too broad.—N. L. R. B. v. General Motors Corporation, C.C.A.7, 116 F.2d 306.

ployer is not shown to have committed or which are not related to the proved unlawful conduct.[16]

The test of the proper scope of a cease and desist order is whether the board might reasonably conclude from the evidence that such order is necessary to prevent the employer from engaging in an unfair labor practice.[17] Accordingly, the board may not issue a blanket order forbidding any acts in violation of the statute or any unfair labor practices[18] where the record does not disclose persistent attempts by varying methods to interfere with the right of self-organization under circumstances in which could be found the threat of continuing and varying efforts to attain the same end in the future.[19] To justify an order restraining violations other than that found, it must appear that they bear some resemblance to that which the employer has committed, or that the danger of their commission in the future is to be anticipated from the course of his conduct in the past.[20]

The board's power as to the scope of its cease and desist orders is analogous to the power of an equity court as to the scope of an injunction order.—May Dept. Stores Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra—N. L. R. B. v. Express Pub. Co., 61 S.Ct. 693, 312 U.S. 426, 85 L.Ed. 930—N. L. R. B. v. Federal Engineering Co., C.C.A.6, 153 F.2d 233, rehearing denied 155 F.2d 17.

Circumstances of case

The breadth and propriety of an order depend on the circumstances of the particular case.—N. L. R. B. v. Express Pub. Co., 61 S.Ct. 693, 312 U.S. 426, 85 L.Ed. 930—N. L. R. B. v. Different plants

(1) Where the employer is found to have violated the act at only one of his plants, the board's order must be limited to such plant and may not be directed to all his plants.—N. L. R. B. v. Ford Motor Co., C.C. A.5, 119 F.2d 326.

(2) Where supervisory employees of parent corporation made coercive statements, the board was authorized to issue a cease and desist order, but it was not authorized to disestablish a labor organization at the plant of a wholly owned subsidiary where such organization was freely formed and operated by the employees themselves.—N. L. R. B. v. Thompson Products, C.C.A.6, 162 F. 2d 287.

In particular cases, a general order has been held to be improper where a violation of only one of the provisions has been found.[21] Thus, a general order has been held to be improper where the only unfair practice committed is discrimination against union employees[22] or domination of a labor organization.[23] Where the employer has refused to bargain, the board's order should go no further than ordering him to bargain and enjoining acts interfering with the representative's effort to negotiate;[24] and an employer's refusal to bargain, while technically it may be a violation of the employees' right of self-organization, does not warrant a general order to desist from interference.[25] However, it has been held that a general order, in the language of the statute restraining interference with the employees' rights, may issue even where the only unfair labor practice is one specifically condemned by other provisions of the statute,[26] as where the unfair practices committed constitute discrimination against union employees,[27] or domination or interference with a labor organization.[28] Where the employer has been found guilty of interfering, intimidating, and coercing, by acts which are not specifically condemned by the other provisions of the statute, it has been held that he may be required not only to cease and desist from doing the number of things found, but also from all manner of like things.[29]

An omnibus order in the statutory language restraining the employer from interfering with the rights guaranteed employees by the statute is proper where the employer has sought, by various methods, to interfere with the right of self-organization and it appears that it will continue to do so.[30] A

One type of worker

Where the employer's interference was limited to one type of worker, the board's order should be similarly restricted.—N. L. R. B. v. Consolidated Mach. Tool Corp., C.C.A.2, 163 F.2d 376.

21. U.S.—American Smelting & Refining Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.8, 126 F.2d 680.

A finding of a single isolated act did not authorize the board to enter blanket order restraining employer from committing any act in violation of the statute.—N. L. R. B. v. Newark Morning Ledger Co., 120 F. 2d 262, 137 A.L.R. 849, certiorari denied Newark Morning Ledger Co. v. N. L. R. B., 62 S.Ct. 363, 314 U.S. 693, 86 L.Ed. 554.

Closed-shop agreement

Where jurisdictional dispute existed and the only unfair practice of employer resulted from closed-shop agreement with union which did not represent majority, provision requiring the employer to cease and desist from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in any manner was eliminated.—Warehousemen's Union, Local 117, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen & Helpers of America, Affiliated with American Federation of Labor v. Where interference with right of self-organization is intertwined with the refusal to bargain, a general order may be improper without a clear determination by the board of an attitude of opposition to the purposes of the act.—May Dept. Stores Co. v. N. L. R. B., 66 S.Ct. 203, 326 U.S. 376, 90 L.Ed. 145, rehearing denied 66 S.Ct. 468, 326 U.S. 811, 90 L. Ed. 495.

b. Restriction to Issues and Pleadings

The order of the National Labor Relations Board should be limited to the issues presented and should be in conformity with the pleadings.

The order of the National Labor Relations Board should be limited to the disposition of the issues actually presented.[37] The board's order should also be in conformity with the pleadings,[38] but this rule is not to be applied technically, and the board may issue an order as to a matter clearly in issue between the parties, although it is technically outside the pleadings.[39] The board may deal adequately with unfair labor practices which are related to those alleged and which grow out of them while the proceeding is pending;[40] and the board may act with respect to an unfair labor practice occurring after the filing of the complaint where it is similar to charges made.[41] The order may be directed at a refusal to bargain which occurs subsequent to the verification of the charge.[42]

c. Restriction to Evidence and Findings

The order must be based on the evidence and be in conformity with, and supported by, the findings.

evidence, an order based on such finding is invalid.[45] The board's order must be directed at an unlawful act as to which a finding has been made;[46] an order to cease and desist from unfair labor practices must be based on findings that the employer has performed improper acts[47] and that such acts constitute unfair labor practices.[48] Thus, an order to bargain may not be made in the absence of a finding that the employer has refused to bargain.[49] The board's order is valid where the findings on which it is based, rather than all of the findings, are valid;[50] where findings sufficient to support the order are valid, the other findings need not be considered.[51] Although some of the findings on which the order is based are invalid, the order may be valid where it is sufficiently supported by other findings.[52]

§ 28(112). —— Effect of Prior Determination

It has been held that the doctrine of res judicata or estoppel may not be invoked to bar the National Labor Relations Board from ordering the cessation of unfair labor practices.

It has been held that the doctrine of res judicata or estoppel may not be invoked to bar the National Labor Relations Board from taking action to stop the commission of unfair labor practices in violation of the statute.[53] Thus, while good practice requires the consolidation of all current charges against an employer, the board is not precluded from acting with respect to certain charges because they could or should have been adjudicated in prior proceedings.[54] The power of the board in relieving against unfair labor practices is not limited by agreements between employer and employees made with the board's approval;[55] nor is it limited by administrative orders which the board has entered.[56] A refusal to file a complaint against an employer because of the board's view that it did not have jurisdiction over him does not preclude the board from thereafter taking action on a new charge and a different state of facts.[57]

§ 28(113). —— Order Moot or Unnecessary

The fact that an employer has ceased his unfair labor practices does not necessarily bar the National Labor Relations Board from ordering him to cease and desist from such practices.

An order of the National Labor Relations Board, if lawful when made, does not become moot by being obeyed or because changing conditions have reduced the need for it.[58] The fact that the employer has ceased his unfair labor practices does not necessarily preclude the board from ordering him to cease and desist from such practices,[59] particularly when the practices are not stopped until charges are filed;[60] but, where such is the case, the order should recognize the fact that the employer has previously voluntarily terminated such practices,[61] and it has been held that the board's order should not be directed at an unfair labor practice which has long ceased and as to which there is no prospect of a recurrence.[62] The board has been held not to be precluded from entering an order against an employer who has discontinued business, where he retains ownership of the property and is in a position to reëngage in business.[63] Where an order covering the matter has already been issued in another proceeding, it should not be repeated in the order in the current proceeding.[64]

§ 28(114). —— Against Whom Order May Run

The orders of the National Labor Relations Board may run against the employer's successors and assigns as well as against the employer who violated the statute.

The orders of the National Labor Relations Board may properly run against the employer's successors and assigns as well as against the employer who violated the statute.[65] The inclusion of the term "successors and assigns" in the order does not, however, enlarge the effect of the order as to such persons beyond the limits fixed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as to the persons bound by a restraining order or an order granting an injunction,[66] and it has been held that the inclusion of the phrase "successors and assigns" in the order does not impose any liability which would not exist if the phrase was not included.[67] It has been held that the order should not include the phrase "successors and assigns," since such phrase is unnecessary.[68]

An order against the receiver of a company may provide that it shall run against the company in the event the receivership is discharged.[69] The board's cease and desist order may run not only against the employer, but against another where such other is so interrelated with the employer that the order must run against both, if the rights of the employees are to be effectively protected.[70] The order may properly run against persons who participated with the employer in his violations of the statute, although such persons are not employers of the employees affected.[71]

§ 28(115). —— Construction of Orders

In construing orders of the National Labor Relations Board, the determinative factor is the intention of the board as gathered from all parts of the order.

Orders of the National Labor Relations Board are to be construed like any other written instrument;[72] the determinative factor is the intention of the board as gathered from all the parts of the order.[73] The order is to be construed as of the time it was made.[74]

§ 28(116). —— Operation and Effect

An order of the National Labor Relations Board is operative until reversed or suspended.

An order of the National Labor Relations Board is operative until reversed or suspended,[75] and it is presumed to have continuing effect until altered by the board.[76] Such an order, however, is not self-executing,[77] and is not final or conclusive in the same sense as a judgment or decree of a court,[78] or in the sense that it may not be changed in the future,[79] and it is not conclusive as to matters not expressly decided.[80] It has been held that a finding by the National Labor Relations Board that an employer failed to bargain in good faith is not binding in proceedings under a state unemployment compensation statute.[81]

The board has the power to set aside its order and findings and to conduct such further procedure as it deems appropriate,[82] and it may amend its order and findings on appropriate notice and hearing to the parties affected.[83] An order directing an employer to withdraw recognition from a labor organization will not prevent the employer from recognizing the organization, if it should be freely chosen by the employees as their bargaining representative.[84]

An order of the board is not to be evaded by indirections or formal observances which in fact defy it,[85] and an employer may not avoid compliance with the board's orders by means of subterfuge.[86]

The entry of an order on consent and stipulation does not detract from its force.[87]

§ 28(117). —— Posting of Notice of Order

The National Labor Relations Board may require the employer to post notices advising its employees of the board's order and that the employer will comply therewith.

The National Labor Relations Board may direct an employer against which it has entered an order to post notices advising its employees of the order[88]

Should be required in all cases

The board should require posting of notices of board's decision by employer in all cases so that employees may have full and accurate information of decisions of the board.—Mooresville Cotton Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 97 F.2d 959.

Mailed notice

An order requiring respondent to mail to employees a notice that employer would not engage in the conduct from which it was ordered to cease and desist would not be disturbed.—N. L. R. B. v. American Laundry Machinery Co., C.C.A.2, 152 F.2d 400.

Order partly obeyed

Order requiring posting and maintaining of notices of cease and desist order was justified, even though it and that it will comply with the order.[89] Thus an employer may be required to post notices of the withdrawal of recognition from a company-dominated union,[90] that it will cease dominating such union,[91] of the disestablishment of such union,[92] or that specified contracts violate the statute and will not be enforced.[93]

The addition to the required notice of other matter which has the effect of altering the total impression to be conveyed by the notice may render it insufficient.[94] It has been held that the employer may be required to post the notices at all of its places of business, including those in which no violation of the act has been committed,[95] but it has also been held that, where the proceeding involves only a particular plant, the required posting of notices should be limited to that plant.[96]

While an order that the notice shall state that the employer will cease and desist from specified practices is valid,[97] it has been pointed out that a notice in such form may imply a confession of guilt, and that the required notice should state, instead, that the employer will not engage in the activity from which it is ordered to cease and desist,[98] or that the order has been approved by the court and is binding on the employer.[99]

Where there is any danger of misinterpretation, the required notice should make it clear that the employees have complete freedom of organization.[1] The notice that an employer-dominated union has

§ 28(118). —— Orders with Respect to Employees' Organizations Dominated by Employer

The National Labor Relations Board may order an employer to cease supporting, dominating, or interfering with an organization of its employees, to refrain from recognizing such organization as bargaining representative, and to disestablish the organization.

Where an employer sponsors, dominates, or interferes with an organization of its employees, the National Labor Relations Board may order it to cease such sponsorship, support, domination, and interference,[4] to cease recognizing such organization as the bargaining representative for its employees[5] and order the employer to refrain from recognizing any labor organization as the representative of its employees until it has been certified as such by the board,[6] to cease giving effect to a contract made with such organization,[7] and to disestablish such organization.[8] Where the employees may reasonably believe that their employer's favor may be won by abandoning a union for an association favored by the employer, the board may employ whatever means it regards as reasonable to bring home to the employees that, as far as their employer is concerned, they are entirely free.[9]

A disestablishment order is a valid remedy where an order that the employer cease and desist from dominating or interfering with the organization would not be sufficient to protect the employees' right to self-organization[10] and whether the continued existence of a labor organization which the employer sponsored, dominated, or interfered with would be an obstacle to its employees' freedom of choice as to self-organization is an inference of fact to be drawn by the board from all the circumstances of the case.[11] It is for the board to determine whether the disestablishment of the organization is necessary to preserve the employees' freedom of choice,[12] and the necessity for such remedy is a matter resting within the discretion of the board.[13] The board may find that the continued existence of a company union established by unfair labor practices or of a union dominated by the employer is a consequence or violation of the act whose continuance thwarts the act and renders ineffective any order restraining the unfair practices.[14] Disestablishment may be ordered where the organization has evolved out of an employer-dominated organization under circumstances which give the employees to understand that the employer favors such organization.[15]

The employer may be ordered to disestablish an employer-dominated union even though it has recognized and entered into collective bargaining with an independent labor organization,[16] or although its interference with, and domination of, such organization has ceased,[17] or although there have been no

The test of successorship to an illegal labor organization which was to be disestablished is whether there existed, in so far as employees are concerned, an appearance of continuity and relation between the illegal organization and later organization so that employees were not apprised of fact that new organization did not carry with it the preference, domination, and interference which accompanied prior organization.—N. L. R. B. v. Landis Tool Co., C.C.A.3, 145 F.2d 152.

Clear line of cleavage

Under National Labor Relations Act, when existing labor organization, unlawful because of employer domination, is succeeded by a new organization, there must be a clear line of cleavage between the old and the new.—Wilson & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.10, 156 F.2d 577, certiorari denied 67 S.Ct. 357, 329 U.S. 789, 91 L.Ed. —.

labor difficulties,[18] or although such order will foster the growth of a national union among the employees;[19] but it has been held that the disestablishment of a company-dominated union should not be ordered where the organization has ceased to exist and there is no likelihood of its revival.[20] An order disestablishing a labor organization as dominated by the employer should make clear the right of the employees to join any labor organization they choose.[21]

It is not clear what action must be taken by an employer to disestablish an employer-dominated organization so as to free both itself and any newly formed organization from later condemnation by the board.[22] It has been held that an order to "disestablish" requires the employer not to recognize, support, or encourage the further existence of the organization for any purpose or in any manner.[23]

Reimbursement of dues deducted by employer. The board may order an employer to reimburse employees for dues deducted from wages for the benefit of an employer-dominated labor organization.[24] Such order is not a redress for a private wrong,[25]

Rights of disestablished organization and its members

The board is not authorized to prohibit an organization which is disestablished from acting lawfully, and, although the board had decided that labor organization could no longer function as bargaining representative, the organization had a constitutional right to express its preference at an election; the members of a disestablished bargaining representative are not deprived of a right to vote in labor elections or to campaign in such elections, and for such legitimate purposes they have a right to be represented by the organization.—N. "We do not regard 'disestablishment' in reference to labor organizations as having any precise, technical meaning. We are not here dealing with the 'dissolution' or 'reorganization' of complex corporate structures. We are concerned with individual rights and human relationships as defined by a sweeping statute."—E. I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.4, 116 F. 2d 388, 399, certiorari denied N. L. What must appear

In order to avoid having a new labor organization regarded as the alter ego or the successor of an old labor organization that was subject to employer domination, it must appear that, prior to the formation of the new organization, the employees were advised by their employer, in substance, that all recognition of the old organization by him had ended, that they were entirely free to join or not to join any other labor organization, and that the employer was completely indifferent as to what organization they joined.—N. L. R. B. v. Rath Packing Co., C.C.A.8, 130 F.2d 540.

Posted notices constituted a sufficient public expression of a disestablishment of the labor organization, and the notices constituted an adequate means of assuring the employees of an absolute freedom of choice in their selection of a collective bargaining agency.—E. nor is it penal[26] or the adjudication of a mass tort.[27] Although it restores to the employees in some measure what was taken from them by the employer's unfair labor practices and somewhat resembles compensation for private injury, such remedy is designed to achieve the elimination of industrial conflict and to vindicate public, not private, rights.[28] The power of the board to order an employer to reimburse employees for dues of a company-dominated union withheld from their pay under the checkoff provisions of a contract between the union and the employer is not dependent on the involuntary nature of the payment, but on the power of the board to take action to remove the effect of an unfair labor practice.[29] The board may order reimbursement of the dues collected by the employer for the employer-dominated labor organization without regard to the actual damage suffered by the employees.[30]

§ 28(119). —— Reinstatement and Back-Pay Orders

a. In general
b. When and as to whom reinstatement may be ordered
c. Amount of back-pay award

a. In General

The National Labor Relations Board may order the reinstatement of employees with or without back pay where such action will effectuate the policies of the statute.

The National Labor Relations Act § 10 c, 29 U.S. C.A. § 160 c, expressly authorizes the National Labor Relations Board to order the reinstatement of employees, with or without back pay, where such action will effectuate the policies of the statute,[31] and whether such relief should be awarded lies within

Confidential employment

Where clerks were wrongfully discharged because of union activities, they were entitled to be restored to their former positions even though they would thereby acquire confidential information; but employer could condition continued employment on employees' not disclosing such information to others, and employer could offer reinstatement in other positions which were substantially equivalent to former positions, as respects wages, character of work, hours and other terms and conditions of employment.—N. the discretion of the board.[32] The board has wide discretion in adapting its reinstatement orders to the circumstances of the particular case.[33] It has been held that an order directing the employer in general terms to offer reëmployment and pay back pay to all his employees who went on strike without naming them is valid where the employer will have an opportunity to present any defense it may have against reinstatement and back pay to any given employee.[34] An order requiring reinstatement is to be reasonably construed[35] and does not prevent the employer from discharging the reinstated employee for any reason which does not involve a violation of the statute.[36]

(2) Supervisory employees.—N. L. R. B. v. Vail Mfg. Co., C.C.A.7, 158 F.2d 664.

Request of union

Where an employee was discharged in violation of the statute at the request of a union with which the employer had a closed-shop contract, the fact that the employee has a civil remedy against the union does not prevent the board from ordering the employer to reinstate him.—N. L. R. B. v. American White Cross Laboratories, C.C.A.2, 160 F.2d 75.

33. U.S.—F. W. Woolworth Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.2, 121 F.2d 658.

Discrimination in favor of union employees

Order that all union employees who were not reinstated should be placed on a preference list to be offered employment as it should become available was erroneous, and the employer should have been required to select union men from preference list only in the old proportion of union men.—F. W. Woolworth Co. v. N. L. R. B., supra.

Physical examination

Employee who had been examined by three physicians, one of whom was employer's physician, and whose record disclosed no physical defect, did not forfeit right to reinstatement because of his refusal to submit to further physical examination.—N. L. R. B. v. Eclipse Moulded Products Co., C.C.A.7, 126 F.2d 576.

Where a strike is in progress at the time of the reinstatement order, the order may provide for reinstatement on the employee's application within a reasonable time.—N. L. R. B. v. Biles Coleman Lumber Co., C. C.A.9, 98 F.2d 18.

34. U.S.—Berkshire Knitting Mills v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.3, 139 F.2d 134, certiorari denied 64 S.Ct. 1158, 322 U.S. 747, 88 L.Ed. 1579.

Substantially equivalent position

An order requiring an employer to reinstate a discharged employee to his former or a substantially equivalent position does not give the employer an option, but requires him to reinstate the employee to his former position if possible, and to a substantially equivalent position if that is not possible.—N. L. R. B. v. Draper Corp., C.C.A.1, 159 F.2d 294.

36. U.S.—Salmon & Cowin v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 148 F.2d 941, certiorari denied 66 S.Ct. 100, 326 U. S. 758, 90 L.Ed. 456.

To keep channels of commerce open

The statute and all proceedings taken under it are for the primary object of keeping the channels of commerce open, and the making an employee whole is secondary object.—Stewart Die Casting Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.7, 132 F.2d 801.

38. U.S.—N. L. R. B. v. Reynolds Corp., C.C.A.5, 155 F.2d 679—Waterman S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 119 F.2d 760—N. L. R. B. v. Mall Tool Co., C.C.A. 7, 119 F.2d 700—N. L. R. B. v. West Kentucky Coal Co., C.C.A.6, 116 F.2d 816—Nanseau v. U. S., D. C.Mich., 52 F.Supp. 395.

A settlement between employer and employee is not binding on the board.—Waterman S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 119 F.2d 760.

Discharged employee's status

An employee discharged contrary to statute takes a peculiar status, and the board has a broad discretion in vindicating the act through him.—Waterman S. S. Corporation v. N. L. R. B., supra.

statement and back pay is remedial and not punitive.[39] The purpose of reinstatement and back-pay orders is to effectuate the policies of the statute,[40] to restore the status that would have existed but for the unfair labor practice,[41] and to discourage the discharge of employees in violation of the statute.[42]

Incidental rights. The board in ordering the reinstatement of an employee may require that he be reinstated with all the rights and benefits which would have accrued to him but for the illegal discharge,[43] including seniority[44] and insurance rights.[45] A reinstatement order does not require that the employee be offered a position identical in its duties with his former work; it is sufficient if the offer is of substantially the same work.[46]

Pleading. The complaint need not specifically raise the issues of reinstatement and back pay in order to warrant an order granting such relief; it is sufficient if the complaint charges unfair labor practices since the statute authorizes the board to order reinstatement and back pay where it finds unfair labor practices,[47] and an order as to reinstatement need not be limited to the persons named in the charge or complaint.[48]

Baldwin Locomotive Works, C.C.A.3, 128 F.2d 39.

Public reparation order

Order directing reinstatement is not private award operating by way of penalty or of damages, but is public reparation order.—Agwilines, Inc., v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A.5, 87 F.2d 146.

The statute creates a legal right in employee and authorizes the board as a remedial measure to order reinstatement with back pay.—Continental Oil Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 10, 113 F.2d 473, case remanded on other grounds 61 S.Ct. 861, 313 U.S. 212, 85 L.Ed. 1292.

Fine or penalty

(1) It has been stated that a back-pay award is not a fine or a penalty. —Social Sec. Board v. Nierotko, Mich., 66 S.Ct. 637, 327 U.S. 358, 90 L.Ed. 718, 162 A.L.R. 1445.

(2) It has also been stated, however, that back-pay orders are in the nature of penalties.—N. L. R. B. v. Williamson-Dickie Mfg. Co., C.C.A. 5, 130 F.2d 260—American Smelting & Refining Co. v. N. L. R. B., C.C.A. 8, 126 F.2d 680—N. L. R. B. v. Tex-O-Kan Flour Mills Co., C.C.A.5, 122 F.2d 433.

Punishment for violation of statute

Provision of statute authorizing affirmative actions, including reinstatement with or without back pay, is intended not to reward employees, but to serve in a measure as a punishment of employer's violation of the act.—N. L. R. B. v. Hudson Motor Car Co., C.C.A.6, 128 F.2d 528—N. L. R. B. v. Carlisle Lumber Co., C.C.A.9, 99 F.2d 533, certiorari denied Carlisle Lumber Co. v. N. L. R. Remedial pay is allowable to employees who have been denied employment because of discrimination practiced by employer.—N. L. R. B. v. Chattanooga Bakery, C.C.A.6, 127 F.2d 201, certiorari denied Chattanooga Bakery v. N. L. R. B., 63 S.Ct. 157, 317 U.S. 676, 87 L.Ed. 543.

Tender in good faith

The board should, on request, cooperate with employer in framing a proper tender to comply with an order directing employer to reinstate illegally discharged employees and make them whole and court will be slow to punish unassisted tenders made in good faith.—Waterman S. Protection of employee

Existence of work. The board's power to order reinstatement does not give it the power to require the employer to hire more men than it needs or to employ a person for whom there is no work;[49] an order directing reinstatement does not mean that such persons must be furnished employment when no employment is available, but that they be restored to their former position and given work when other like employees are given work.[50] The board may require the employer to discharge employees hired since the unfair labor practice to make room for the persons ordered to be reinstated,[51] but it may not require for such purpose the discharge of employees hired before that time.[52] The employer may be required to place on a preferential hiring list those persons entitled to reinstatement for whom there is no work.[53] Where an employer refuses to bargain after its employees have gone out on strike, the board may order the employer to reinstate strikers whose positions have been filled since the refusal to bargain, and to place the balance of the strikers on a preferential list for employment.[54]

Sale or abandonment of business. An implicit condition of an order of reinstatement is the continued operation of the business by the offending employer,[55] but an order directing an employer to reinstate certain employees is operative although the business is continued under a disguise to evade the order,[56] and the order is enforceable despite a change in the name or the apparent ownership of the business.[57] The death of one of the partners who constituted the employers will not prevent the issuance of a reinstatement and back-pay order.[58] A reinstatement order may issue although that branch of the employer's business in which the employee was engaged has been abandoned,[59] or his former position has been abolished,[60] where the employer can offer him substantially equivalent employment. A voluntary sale of the vessel on which the wrongfully discharged employee was employed does not bar an order for reinstatement and back pay where the employer is operating a number of other vessels.[61]

Rights of employee's creditors in back-pay award. A back-pay award is not a private judgment or chose in action of the employee and he has no property right in the award pending his actual receipt of the money in so far as the rights of third persons and creditors are concerned.[62] Third persons may litigate the title to the back pay when paid over to the employee and may when permitted by state law subject the money to attachment, but they may not by judicial process command payment of the award to others than those designated in the board's order.[63] It is for the board to determine in what circumstances it will aid third persons seeking satisfaction of their claims against the employee out of the back-pay award.[64]

b. When and as to Whom Reinstatement May Be Ordered

The National Labor Relations Board may order the reinstatement of employees only where the employer has been guilty of unfair labor practices. The power of the board to order reinstatement is not limited to persons discharged by the employer, but extends to persons the employer refuses to hire where such refusal is an unfair labor practice.

Although it has been stated in general terms that the power of the National Labor Relations Board to order reinstatement is limited to persons who are employees of the employer found to have committed unfair labor practices[65] at the time of the order,[66] the power of the board to order reinstatement with or without back pay is not limited to persons discharged by the employer, but extends to persons the employer refuses to hire where such refusal is an unfair labor practice.[67] Where the employer's unfair practices resulted in a loss of wages, although the employee was not discharged, the board may nevertheless order the employer to make good the loss of wages.[68] The board may order payment of back wages to a discharged employee although it does not order his reëmployment,[69] but
